MRS. F., PENNSYLVANIA. The securities mentioned in your letter are attractive investment issues, and I think you will be safe in buying them. I strongly advise any CHRISTIAN HERALD reader to well diversify his or her investment selections. Do not put all your money into any one security or into any one class of security, and whatever form of investment your money goes into determine, first, that there is a market for the stock or bond if you desire to sell it at some subsequent time. I believe the securities sold by the Pittsburg firm meet with this requirement.

A., LOUISIANA. Inasmuch as the Bankers' Corporation of Philadelphia is out of corporate existence and you do not state the name of the three electric railways which serve as security for your bond, you are requested to furnish this very important information before we can give you definite advices.

A. E. O., NEW YORK. All of the concerns mentioned in your letter offer investors no more than what may be regarded at best as risky speculations. I do not recommend any of them. This advice is no reflection on these companies, but from the very nature of the undertakings a considerable amount of hazard must be present at all times. You should make your investment commitments with exceeding care, and not endeavor to secure the last possible per cent. of promised income. The bonds of railways or public utility securities, preferably those listed on the New York Stock Exchange, or securities offered by prominent investment firms, are the best investment for you, and they offer a fair income return. Your investment then will be safe and your money can be secured at any time you need it.

The White Paint Beautiful

We all admire the house painted white. It speaks cheerfulness, hospitality and the simplicity of good taste. True, all architecture and all locations will not tolerate undimmed whiteness, but there are many houses that would be more home-like if painted pure white.

A weather-proof paint that is really a clear, pure white is rare. White Lead has long been the standard white paint, yet none was really white until the Carter process of making white lead was perfected.

Compare Carter with any other white lead or white paint and you will surely decide that your white house must be painted with Carter.

To make white paint, Carter White Lead is thinned with linseed oil to proper consistency. To make colored paint, your painter will add tinting colors. In either white or colors, pure Carter White Lead and linseed oil paint will be found both durable and economical.

Everyone who has painting to do should have a copy of "Pure Paint," a text book on house painting. Sent free on request. A sample tube of Carter will be sent free to anyone who is thinking of painting White.

Questions and Answers

F. E. G., Churchville, Va. 1. It would be pure speculation to answer your question concerning the ultimate fate of the Jews who have passed away since the death of Christ. We have no right to judge men; judgment belongs to God alone. Besides, in all ages he has raised up witnesses to himself in the persons of godly men and women who, although they might never have heard the Gospel message, have lived according to their highest lights in a way that may have been acceptable, and whose faith has been accounted to them for righteousness. 2. Geologists recognize three great kingdoms in nature, the animal, vegetable and mineral.

H. M., Middletown, Ohio. The first day of the week was called by the early Christians the "Lord's Day" (see I Cor. 11: 20; Rev. 1: 10) as distinguishing with special honor the day of Christ's resurrection. On this day the apostles were assembled when the Holy Ghost descended upon them. On this day, Paul preached in Troas, when the disciples came and "brake bread," and the directions which the apostles gave to the Christians alluded to their religious assemblies on the first day. Pliny the historian refers to a "certain day of the week" being kept as a festival in honor of the resurrection. There are many, however, who hold that these arguments are not conclusive and that there is no law in the New Testament concerning the first day, although its observance among Christians has become practically a universal custom. As soon as Christianity was protected by the civil powers, the Lord's Day was ordered by law to be kept sacred.

S. H., Williamston, N. C. Investigations in Bible lands have done much to nullify the efforts of destructive or "higher" criticism. Excavations of ancient Babylonian tablets have corroborated the Biblical story of the Flood. The discovery of Assyrian inscriptions has proved the identity of Sargon, one of the greatest of the kings of that nation (see Isa. 20: 1-4); identification of the site of Nineveh and of the Tower of Babel or "Birs Nimrud." Many things have been brought to light confirming Scripture history, but the subject is too large to be discussed in a MAIL-BAG paragraph. Read Anti-Higher Criticism, by Rev. L. W. Munhill, which you may procure through any bookseller.

W. M. H., Connelly Springs, N. C. 1. Literally, idolatry ceased among the Jews at the Captivity; thus the prophecy has already been fulfilled. But "cleansing from all their idols"—that is, covetousness, prejudice against the Gospel, etc.—is yet to come in the future. 2. The Methodist Church. 3. Protestantism took its rise as the result of the Reformation. 4. It is possible for a good man to backslide, and there are various passages which show that the position of such is a most dangerous one; but one who has been thoroughly converted and regenerated is freed from the dominion of sin and temptation loses its power. 5. All Baptists claim that the apostolic church was essentially Baptist. In the middle of the third century the Novatian Baptists established a separate and independent church, and these were probably the earliest of which there is any historical record. In later times, the Anabaptists in 1536 organized a Baptist denomination in Germany and Holland.

S. N., Schnectady, N. Y. While we agree in the main with your remarks, we do not discuss politics in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The passage you refer to is found in Isa. 2: 4, also in Joel 3: 10 and Micah 4: 3. It is a passage descriptive of the peacefulness of Christ's coming kingdom. Rev. 13: 18 implies that "spiritual wisdom" is needed to solve the mystery of the preceding verses, and that it is not to be found by any other means. A great many commentators have discussed the "mark of the beast," and some have identified Antichrist with Rome, applying the name Lateinos (666); others have held that it refers to Balaam, and still others that it is the number of the world-power or Antichrist given over to judgment.

J. L. B., Wood, Mo. 1. The passage you quote has been repeatedly explained in THE MAIL-BAG. It is clear, however, that in all the New Testament there is no vestige of any special or exclusive authority having been claimed or exercised by Peter, or that he was clothed with any power or gift above the rest of the apostles. 2. Matt. 19: 24 is an illustration which must have had a familiar sound to Jesus' hearers. "The needle's eye" was the common designation of a small door which formed a part of the general framework of the gateway of a city and which, when the gate itself was closed, would admit only a single foot passenger. To force a camel through so small an entrance after the closing of the main gate would be difficult if not impossible.

D. A. P., Smithfield, Ohio, writes concerning sinlessness: "What is sinlessness? The state of being free from sin. What is sin? 'Whatsoever is not of faith is sin.' Rom. 14: 23. 'The thought of foolishness is sin.' Prov. 24: 9. 'Sin is lawlessness.' 1 John 3: 4. John Wesley, Ser. Vol. 1, p. 15, taught: 'Ye are saved from sin. This is the salvation which is through faith. This is that great salvation, foretold by the angel before God brought his first-begotten into the world: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins." And neither here nor in other parts of Holy Writ is there any limitation or restriction. All that believe in him, he will save from all their sins; from original and actual, past and present, sin of the flesh and of the spirit. Through faith that is in Him they are saved both from the guilt and power of it.' Sinlessness is gloriously possible. Adam and Eve, as they came from the hand of God, were sinless. Gen. 1: 27-31. If man cannot regain that pristine purity, then Satan has wrought a ruin that Christ cannot repair. 'Where sin abounded, grace did abound more exceedingly.' II Cor. 5: 21: 'Him who knew no sin he made sin [offering] on our behalf that we might become the righteousness of God in him.' Jehovah had respect unto Abel and to his offering, 'through which he had witness borne to him that he was righteous, and he being dead yet speaketh.' Heb. 11: 4. 'Enoch was translated that he should not see death; for he had witness borne to him that before his translation he had' (Gen. 5: 22) 'been pleasing to God.' Heb. 11: 5. Enoch walked with God 300 years. Joseph was a sinless man. 'How can I do this great wickedness and sin against God?" Gen. 39: 9; 49: 22-26. Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego (the first Y. M. C. A.) were lion-proof and fire-proof against sin. Zacharias and Elisabeth 'were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless.' Most of these were married and had offspring. Celibacy is not sinlessness. See I. Thess. 5: 23, 24."

E. C. S., North Carolina. 1. A legend is a narrative based chiefly on tradition, or it may be a fable, or a myth. 2. Quinine is a compound derived from cinchona bark or its salts. The first mention of its use in medicine is by Gomez of Lisbon in 1811. 3. Roger Williams was baptized by Ezekiel Halliman, a layman, in March, 1639, by immersion, and he then baptized Holliman and ten others. He afterwards withdrew from the church then organized.

T. H. C., St. Paul, Minn. 1. The passage in Luke 13: 24, taken in connection with the preceding verses, indicates that we must "strive" or "struggle" to enter in; that we must contend for the mastery, for divine help over sin, and must literally "lay hold" on salvation. It is as though one must fight or force his way in. For the slothful, faithless or indifferent such a struggle will be difficult indeed. On the other hand, those who seek aright—that is, in faith and with an honest, resolute purpose—will not be disappointed. See the passage in James 1: 5-7, which tells us that the waverer or the unbeliever cannot realize this promise. It is therefore altogether wholly a matter of faith, and confidence in God's Word, nothing doubting. 2. A limousine is simply a closed auto.

Miscellaneous

V. B., Stone, Okla. Modern chronology is reckoned from A.D. 1, the first year of our Lord and Saviour.

Mrs. A. E. H., South Windham, Conn. It is customary for the congregation to stand during the singing of the Gloria Patri, in which the entire body of worshipers is expected to join.

J. H., St. Marys, Ont., Canada. The name of David's mother is nowhere given. The passage you mention has not been overlooked by the commentators, but is not considered convincing on the subject.

J. T. L., East Chattanooga. 1. See answer to another reader concerning Noah's Ark. 2. It is true that a portion of the Chinese indemnity was returned by this government as an act of right and justice.

C. H. F., Union Springs, Ala. A summary outline of the various creeds is given in The Christian Herald Almanac for 1912. For a fuller presentation, consult McClintock & Strong's Biblical Encyclopedia.

A Troubled One. See answers to Reader, in CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 26, 1912; Anxious, September 25, 1912; Interested Subscriber, December 18, 1912. If you will forward name and address a personal letter will be sent to you.

F. J. N., Vilas, Colo. There are many rash statements made in attempting Scriptural interpretations, which are not warranted by the context. Paul was a special chosen vessel, and was doubtless in a state of grace after his miraculous call, when he saw "the heavenly vision." But we should not read in meanings or conclusions that are not contained in the record.

Interested Reader, Troy, Idaho. 1. We do not doubt that there are many good Christians belonging to the party you mention. 2. Travelers have reported that the only people whom they have ever encountered who seem to have no apprehension of religion and no knowledge of God are the Solomon Islanders. We know of no other part of the world where the inhabitants seem to have no conception of a divine Being.

OUR ITALIAN NEIGHBORS*

WHEN we look at the Italian from the standpoint of the sympathizing and helping Christ, we see less of his faults and shortcomings and more of his excellences. We begin to want to help him fulfil some of the dreams which were in his heart when he came to America.

It is hard for us to realize what it means to races like the Italian to cut loose entirely from the traditions and environment of their home land and begin life all over again in a new world. The spiritual problems of the Italian have been made more difficult also by his gradual drift away from the Catholic Church. The political upheaval in Italy which separated the state from the influence of the church had, in many individual cases, the effect of leading people, particularly young men, to break away entirely from religion. Protestant missions had not yet begun their work and the result was that many slipped into infidelity. But even those who stayed in the Catholic Church in the home land drift away from it here, and if they are not reached by the missions and churches of Protestantism, they, too, wander into unbelief.

This makes it still more apparent that the Protestant Church of America has a very grave responsibility in rescuing the souls of these aliens as well as in giving them an opportunity for earning a livelihood and developing their minds. It has been proved in thousands of instances that the Italians make splendid Protestants. In New York City, especially, work among the Italians has been strikingly successful. The Evangelistic Committee of that city has been instrumental in forming a number of Italian churches as the result of its summer campaigns. One of them now has 320 members and has sent out three ordained ministers and one missionary.

The Epworth League ought to be especially zealous in its work for the Italian because the doctrines and atmosphere of Methodism are particularly well adapted to the Italian temperament. They love enthusiasm and good cheer and hearty songs. They can be brought into the churches of Methodism if Methodist people, particularly Methodist young people, will go and get them. Small missions can be started which will grow to big ones; sewing classes can be started among the children and mothers' meetings among the women. The men can be gathered into classes for the study of English, a work which is carried on successfully by the Young Men's Christian Association. The Italians are quick to learn. Their children do well at school and the magnificent achievements of their nation in science, philosophy, pedagogy, literature, music, and art show to what splendid heights members of that race may attain. The Epworth League should earnestly strive to do its part in helping these neighbors of ours to the better and the best things.

Bible Work†

ROBERT ARTHINGTON of Leeds recently attracted world-wide attention and won the most heartfelt praise from God's people all over the world by his bequest of 1,000,000 pounds, nearly $5,000,000, for the spread of the Gospel in heathen lands. He chose the books of Matthew, Luke and Acts as those best fitted to carry the message and directed that the money be used in circulating copies of these books in every heathen land and in every written language. This is the latest great indication of the recognized power which the Bible has to

WHITE CARS

Include All of the Improvements Which the Purchaser Should Insist Upon Obtaining in a High-Priced Car

The discriminating purchaser should protect himself against the possibility of his car becoming obsolete in design shortly after his investment.

It is not enough that the car he chooses measures up to the prevailing standards of the day. Undue depreciation is bound to occur unless the car embraces every one of these fundamental features of design:

Long Stroke, Economical Motor—Monobloc Cylinders—
Four Speed, Selective Transmission.

To purchase a car that does not have every one of these important features is to purchase a car that is already practically obsolete.

White cars have possessed every one of these up-to-date, practical features for two years. In White Cars the protection of your investment is unquestioned for years to come. The superior value of White Cars is therefore evident.

LOOKING TOWARD THE LIGHT

I ASKED the robin as he sprang
From branch to branch and sweetly sang,
What made his breast so round and red.
"'Twas looking toward the sun," he said.

I asked the violets sweet and blue,
Sparkling with the morning dew,
Whence came their color. Then, so shy,
They answered, "Looking toward the sky."

I saw the roses one by one
Unfold their petals to the sun.
I asked what made their tints so bright.
They answered, "Looking toward the light."

I asked the thrush whose silvery note
Came like a song from angel's throat,
What made him sing in the twilight dim.
He answered, "Looking up to Him."

carry life to human hearts. Dan Crawford, in his remarkable book, Thinking Black, tells how a native African, who had been converted, but who slipped back into heathenism, was won again to the Gospel by opening his Bible and hearing there the voice of Christ urging him to return. He declared that the conviction came upon him with fresh surprise that God could speak his language. This is the universal experience. When people read the Bible they feel that God is talking to them in their own language and their consciences urge them to yield to him. The Bible still holds its rank as the most popular book in the world. Besides the thousands of volumes that are given away, its actual sales far outnumber those of any other book.

Christian Endeavor Societies are called upon to aid in this task, which is so simple, yet which has such immeasurable results. It is related that a Chinese bought a copy of the Bible and took it to the village in which he lived. Within three years missionaries were asked to come and dedicate a church in that village which was the direct outgrowth of that single volume. "Sophy," the consecrated scrubwoman, who has won so many friends in and around New York and throughout the country by her faithful work and her quaint "sermons," makes a specialty of giving away Gospels of John. Many nickels and dimes which she can illy spare are spent in purchasing copies of this beautiful Gospel, and find their way into the pockets and hands of outcast men and women in the slums and of convicts in the penitentiaries.

By our gifts, but most of all by our actual work, we may and must help to spread this Word of Life "at home and abroad."

Baptist Bible Work*

THE writer of the article on "Baptists" in the new Catholic Encyclopedia, in defining their distinctive principles, says: "The Baptists consider the Scriptures to be the sufficient and exclusive rule of faith and practice." This is true, and because it is true Baptists should be foremost in seeking to spread the Holy Scriptures among all peoples in every land and tongue. Have they been so, and are they so now? Let us see.

Formerly, Baptist Bible work was carried on through several agencies. In 1883 it was put into the hands of the American Baptist Publication Society, the officers of which have endeavored faithfully to carry out the instructions under which they are working. The spirit of these instructions was that the society should supply the Home Mission Society with Bibles and New Testaments for distribution—gratuitously, if necessary—and to make grants of money to the Foreign Mission Society for translation and distribution of the Scriptures on the foreign field. This has been done, so far as funds have been supplied for the purpose.

During the year 1911-12 there were granted over 240,000 copies of the Scriptures, including Bibles, New Testaments, and parts, including the King James, Canterbury, and Bible Union Versions, and in various languages other than English. The number would have been much greater but for the unfortunate falling off in contributions for this purpose. In the year ending March 1, 1912, these amounted to only $722.48 and but for an income of about $5,000 from a Bible Fund, the Bible work of the denomination would have been reduced to almost nothing. The figures are official. The Young People's Union should help vigorously in increasing these funds.

* BAPTIST BIBLE WORK. B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, April 27, 1913. (Neh. 8: 1-18.)

"Stay Beautiful" Walls

Here is a new plan—beautiful walls that cost little to keep fresh. Decorate the ceiling and upper walls (beyond the reach of soiling finger marks) in Alabastine, the famous water-color wall tint.

But paint the lower walls (also kitchen and bathroom) with Alabasco, the washable flat wall paint.

Alabastine
The Beautiful Wall Tint

Comes ready to be mixed with cold water and applied with regular wall brush. Every beautiful shade of all colors possible. Sanitary. Will not rub off, chip nor peel when applied according to directions on package Dealers keep it.

Write us if yours does not. Ask for Alabastine. Alabastine is not kalsomine. Alabastine is vastly different.

Alabastine, the water-color wall tint, applied on upper wall.

Alabasco, the washable wall paint, for lower wall.

Parts of your walls get finger-marked or splashed with water—as bathroom, kitchen, stairway, etc. On these use the washable flat wall paint Alabasco. It has all the merits of Alabastine and is washable besides.

Use Alabastine on upper walls and ceiling and Alabasco on lower walls, and at small cost you will have walls always fresh and clean.

For Office Buildings

Alabasco is ideal for office buildings, apartments, schools, halls, public buildings, etc. By using Alabasco, which can be washed on lower parts of walls—and Alabastine on upper parts of walls and ceilings—you get a job that is as satisfactory as all paint at a fraction of the cost.

If you cannot get Alabastine and Alabasco, for goodness sake (wall goodness) don't take a substitute. Write and we will tell you where you can get them.

Questions and Answers

W. R. B., Liberty, N. Y. In regard to the Holy Scriptures being inspired: were the ideas revealed given to the inspired writers, leaving them to select the language in which the ideas were to be communicated, or were both the ideas and the precise words for their expression given?

There are various theories of inspiration. The most reasonable is that God is in the Bible as a whole, not necessarily implying that each syllable is the precise utterance of the Holy Spirit, but that the whole Bible is God's message to the souls of men. Any one who wants to find God can find him in the Bible. All who seek holiness and eternal life can find them by "searching the Scriptures." And even though we may believe that in many passages, particularly in the historical books, the writers were left free to use their own language, we know also that countless souls have had countless experiences in which the words of Scripture have been proven to be the very personal words of God himself communicating directly with them.

M. C. H., Detroit, Mich. Astrology is a pseudo-science, that is, not recognized as genuine. It is as old as history itself and was practiced in ancient Babylonia. It has had many famous disciples, however, and even such distinguished men as Tycho Brahe and Kepler were fascinated by it, but the Copernican system gave it its death-blow. Belief in astrology is not now held in any Christian country and it is confined to the practice of charlatans.

H. L. The passage in Heb. 4: 8 means that as God's rest was a Sabbatism, so shall our rest hereafter be. In this world there are many Sabbaths; but in the next, there will be the enjoyment of keeping one perfect and eternal rest, in which the whole renovated creation shall share. In this illustration Jesus is the antitype of Joshua. The Jews called the future rest "the day which is all Sabbath."

R. McG., New Haven, Conn. The true meaning of the much discussed passage you have quoted is thus explained by a very good authority, Professor David Smith, who writes in the British Weekly: "'Master' or 'Teacher' was the regular appellation of a Jewish Rabbi, and it was accounted so honorable that it always stood alone without qualification. It was a deliberate departure from the established usage, an intentional improvement on the common style, when the young ruler addressed our Lord as 'Good Master.' It showed that he had recognized him as more than a teacher; and when our Lord fastened upon the epithet, his purpose was to elicit what his questioner really meant. He said in effect: 'You have gone a long way in calling me "good." That epithet belongs only to God. You have recognized me as more than a teacher: are you prepared to go farther, and recognize me as divine?' Hence it appears that our Lord's question is not a repudiation of the attribute of deity. On the contrary, it is an assertion of his title to it. It is a gracious attempt to bring home to that anxious inquirer, in conscious realization, the truth which he had dimly perceived and was groping for."

J. B. F., Blanket, Texas. How is it that in the account given in Matthew of the healing of blind Bartimeus the statement is made that there were two blind men, both of whom were healed? In the account in Luke only one man is mentioned and his name is not given. Matt. 20: 29-34; Mark 10: 46-52; Luke 18: 35-43.

At the close of John's Gospel he declares that Jesus performed very many more miracles than those that were recorded. We know that this must have been so, for Jesus was busy many days for many months, yet only a few of his cures were actually recorded. Some miracles are recorded in only one Gospel, some in two, some in three, one in four, many not at all. So there were two men healed of blindness just outside Jericho, as Matthew states. One of them was so vehement in his cries and was such an impetuous, interesting character that Mark learned his name, and remembered it when he came to write his Gospel. Luke, thinking of this one particularly striking character, tells of his cure, though he does not mention his name, nor the fact that he had a companion. John does not record the incident at all, giving the space to other deeds and words of the Saviour.

G. W. R., Laurel Springs, N. C. Please explain II Cor. 3: 18.

The marginal reading in the Revised Version gives "reflecting" instead of beholding. This makes the meaning much clearer. Christians should be mirrors, reflecting the glory of God. Visitors to the Sistine Chapel in the Vatican procure small mirrors which enable them to enjoy the great paintings of Michael Angelo on the ceiling without discomfort. Worldly people will not look at God, but they do look at us, and they should see God reflected in us, as the great master's paintings are reflected in the mirror. As we thus behold and reflect God we become constantly more like him ("are transformed into the same image") going from one glorious stage of experience to another ("from glory to glory"). "Even as from the Lord the Spirit" (R. V.) means in a manner that befits the character and manner of the Holy Spirit. He works this transformation in us in the same perfect, adequate, godlike manner in which he always works. Compare Ex. 34: 29-35; Ps. 34: 5; Acts 4: 13. Read the whole of this chapter and the next, II Cor. 3 and 4.

M. H., Westfield, Ind. The passage in Josephus' Antiquities (book XVIII, chapter 3) concerning Christ has been much discussed. Josephus was born in A.D. 37, and could not have failed to be cognizant of the leading events occurring in that period of history. He was a Jew, but broad-minded and judicial in his historical work. There are, however, eminent scholars who have claimed that the paragraph in question is an interpolation, and that the writings of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Chrysostom, Origen and others would have referred to the passage, had it existed in their time. Others point to the fact that the meager reference is in line with the candor and brevity of Josephus in his mention of John the Baptist (same book, chapter 5, paragraph 2) and of James the brother of Jesus (see book XX, chapter 9, par. 1). As a Jew, he could not have been expected to vouch for the Messiahship. Altogether, the question of genuineness is one which, having been raised, cannot now be determined absolutely either way.

H. D., Allentown, Mo. There is a tendency among a certain class of critics to symbolize many things in Scripture even where the text is clear and explicit. The Bible language concerning future punishments and rewards cannot be explained away by such methods. While the Bible abounds in metaphor and similitude, these are used in their proper places, and to the diligent student, who searches with faith and an open mind, they are not confusing. Certainly, where it refers to God the Creator, the loving and merciful Father, to his Son the Saviour, and to the plan of salvation for the redemption of the human race, it is sufficiently clear to have convinced countless multitudes and have transformed their lives. We have not space at disposal to discuss all the points you mention. Read the Bible from cover to cover, asking for divine enlightenment, and that you may have faith to believe.

A. L., Van Camp, Ont., Can. We are not to judge others. The instances you mention, where non-believers are associated with believers in church work, are not infrequent. It is our duty to give them a welcome and help them, by counsel and example, to know and accept the Gospel. It is a fair presumption that they do not associate with God's people from mere curiosity, but that they are really seeking to know the way. To put an obstacle in their path or to turn them away from the sanctuary would be un-Christian. Rather strive to win them, by all means. "He that winneth souls is wise."

O. S., Missaukee, Mich., and M. M., Yonkers, N. Y. Dancing is mentioned some thirty times in the Bible. The dancing of early times had nothing in common with the modern dance. Originally a phase of worship, expressive of joy and gratitude to God for his blessings, or a stately function to celebrate some great public occasion, the dance has degenerated until it has become in a large measure a menace to morals. Promiscuous dancing of the class found in too many places nowadays is so full of peril that many of the churches have condemned it and urged its avoidance.

Mrs. E. M. D., Brooklyn, N. Y. Life is a precious gift from God and should be so valued. Pain and suffering are to be regarded as discipline. There is no Scriptural authority to justify the view that we have a right to shorten or terminate our existence. Suicide is a crime under human law, and in the early church it was condemned by repudiation and the denial of Christian burial. See Paul's advice to the Philippian jailer. (Acts 16: 28; also Job 14: 14.)

Mrs. M. A., Kansas. The carrying out of a mother's will indicating her desire as to the disposition of her estate after her death is one of the most sacred of trusts and should be so regarded both by the executors and beneficiaries. Even though the will was not probated its faithful execution should not be neglected. One-tenth of the estate for the Lord's work is not an undue proportion, and the testator in making such a bequest probably had in mind the Biblical tithe. If her wishes have not been carried out, the opportunity may still be open for restitution. It is impossible for one professing Christian principles to conclude that the plain duty indicated in this case could be evaded without violation of our spiritual nature.

R. S., Sullivan, Ind. Aaron's rod was preserved in the tabernacle and, according to Paul (see Heb. 9: 4) it was kept in the Ark, beside the two tablets of stone and the pot of manna. There is no mention of any other receptacle. The statement in I Kings 8: 9 implies that by Solomon's time these relics had disappeared. It is possible, however, for a different interpretation to be placed on Deut. 31: 26, which may mean that the rod was kept beside the Ark, and not within it.

H. M. G., Friend, Ore. Your question implies a conflict between the Bible and chronology which does not actually exist. In Gen. 1: 1 the language relative to the Creation is simply "in the beginning" a period of remote and unknown antiquity incalculable by human means. See also Prov. 8: 22, 23 for an elaboration of the same thought. The chronology which you find in the margins of many Bibles is not a part of the book itself, but was the work of James Ussher, a distinguished Irish prelate, who lived in the sixteenth century, and who reckoned from the birth of Christ backward as far as he could find a historical basis, but whose calculations are very often misunderstood. Geology and archeology have gone far beyond Usher's boundaries, but they do not conflict with the Bible. We may add that nowhere among the best church scholars are Ussher's calculations now confused with the age of the earth or the antiquity of the human race.

S. G. P., Eugene, Ore. 1. Esperanto is a practical universal language in the sense that a number of business houses having international relations issue catalogues and carry on correspondence in it, and there are about a hundred periodicals published in it. Many nations, States and cities have introduced it into their public schools. 2. The words are mostly derived from Latin, with a sprinkling from English, German and other languages, so chosen that the meanings of the majority of the roots are obvious to all moderately educated persons. 3. There are less than 3,000 root words in Esperanto, many of them common to all the European languages. 4. An American who knows no language but English and Esperanto can travel from Paris to Yokohama, being met at every station by a native Esperantist with a badge, who will entertain him during his stay and see him safely on his journey. This has been done repeatedly, because Esperantists are idealists and enthusiasts. The New Testament is published in Esperanto, as well as large portions of the Old, which will soon be completed.

J. M. M., Pittsville, Mo. The passage in Acts 8: 26 means that the road to Gaza, not the city itself, was unpopulated and unsuited to cultivation—a bleak and dreary section. For a description of the highways of Palestine see The Real Palestine, by Gaston Leary (McBride, Nast & Co., Chicago, publishers).

W. F. E., McCall, S. C. 1. The passage in Jude, which refers to the dispute between Michael and Satan over the body of Moses, is the only reference of the kind found in the Scriptures. It is inferred that it was a judicial contest, Satan, as having power of death, opposing the raising of Moses again; but that Michael prevailed was apparent from the presence of Moses with Elijah at the transfiguration. The contest was held as a tradition among the Jews. 2. The passage in Acts, 2d chapter, should be studied as including verses 25-36. Peter, who was the preacher, referred to Psalm 16. He spoke of the Holy One who, though he tasted of death, would rise again without seeing corruption, and would be admitted to the immediate presence of God. This, he pointed out, could not refer to David, but could mean only One whom David had learned to expect as the final occupant of the throne of Israel. The Psalmist's prophecy had its only proper fulfilment in Jesus the Messiah.

Mrs. C. N., Chicago, Ill. We are familiar with the passage in Nahum 2: 4, 5 and with the fanciful explanations that have been attached to it assuming it to be a prophecy of modern invention. The real interpretation is, however, that the prophet was describing the Medo-Babylonian preparations for the attack that ultimately destroyed Nineveh. The "fir trees" were the long lances, the shaking of which struck terror to beholders; the "rage" was the furious driving of the chariots, whose flashing armor in the open places in the suburbs of Nineveh, reflected in the sunlight, resembled the gleam of torches. "Recount his worthies" is the monarch's review of his military forces and his choice of those men of valor who were to lead the attack.

A School Savings Bank

HERE is the most distinctive savings bank in the world. It is not a national bank or a Bank of England, but a little savings bank in one of the public schools in Cincinnati. Under the guidance of Miss Sallie Webb, the teacher, over a thousand little children are saving their small change which formerly was spent recklessly for sweets and trinkets from venders who gather in front of the school building and reap a harvest of small coins from the children. This plan of allowing the children to deposit their small change in this unique savings bank was tried out in one of the grades last winter, and it proved so successful that the savings bank was formally opened to the whole school at the beginning of the present school term. The first week brought in over $150 to the credit of the scholars, and two assistants had to be called upon to help take care of the many depositors. The children make the deposits before school, at noon and after school. So eager are the depositors to place their coins in saving that a long line always forms right after school is dismissed. Several of the older scholars have quite a savings account to their credit. After it reaches a certain amount the sum is taken out of the school savings bank, and placed to the child's credit in a regular savings bank where it begins to draw three per cent. interest. These pictures show a line of scholars with their deposit books awaiting their turn to place money in the school savings bank. The teacher, Miss Webb, is busy recording the savings. Hazel Baldwin, aged six years, is the bank's youngest depositor.

Miscellaneous

C. O., Paterson, N. J. The passage in Gen. 1: 28 is the first command to the human race. It is not to be interpreted as implying the existence of other human inhabitants.

I. H. A., Yonkers, N. Y. Three distinct cases are mentioned in the Gospels in which Jesus raised persons from the dead, viz.: the widow's son of Nain, Luke 7: 11-17; the daughter of Jairus at Capernaum, Matt. 9: 24, 25; Lazarus of Bethany, John 11: 43, 44.

T. H. R., Flushing, N. Y. The name Edwin E. Chiverly, which appeared on an article from Kuweit in the April 2 issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, was an inadvertent mistake made in the mechanical department, and should have read Edwin E. Calverley.

Reader. In Matt. 5: 48 Jesus placed before his hearers the great divine Model, the heavenly Father. He was speaking of the kind of excellence which was to distinguish his disciples, and to characterize his kingdom, and they were to take the perfect One as their example and strive, as far as possible, to conform to the divine perfection.

MY VISIT TO THE LAND OF ASSUR

NEW LIGHT SHED ON BIBLE HISTORY BY THE GERMAN EXCAVATIONS IN ARABIA

PACKING ANTIQUITIES IN THE COURTYARD OF THE GERMANS' HOUSE AT ASSUR

By Professor Edgar J. Banks

Nearly four thousand years ago, it is not quite certain just when, a colony of Babylonians migrated to the north. By the Tigris River they made for themselves a home and called it Assur, perhaps from the god Assur whom they worshiped. The ruins of that city are now called Shergat. In time this colony of Babylonians became independent, with a king of their own and with ever-increasing power. They no longer called themselves Babylonians, but Assyrians, or "the people of Assur."

About eight centuries passed; the king of the Assyrians left the city of Assur, which had now grown wealthy, with temples and palaces, and built a new city near the place where the river Zab joins the Tigris. The ruins of that city are now called Nimrud. Here the kings of Assyria flourished, and the empire became great. In 722 B.C. again the king of Assyria desired a new home, and Sargon, the founder of a new dynasty, went still farther north above Mosul and built a new city which he called Dur Sharrukin; the name by which its ruin is known is Khorsabad. There Sargon constructed a beautiful palace, but when he died in 705 B.C., his son Sinacherib sought a new home. There was a little town called Nineveh on the river not far away, then an unimportant place, and this he selected as a place for the royal residence. For just a hundred years the kings of Assyria lived at Nineveh, beautifying and enlarging it until it became one of the wonders of the world. In 606 B.C. the Assyrian empire came to an end; Nineveh was destroyed, and the great city became two large ruin mounds.

During September last I visited these four old Assyrian capitals, Shergat, Nimrud, Khorsabad and Nineveh. Kaleh Shergat, as the Arabs call these ruins of Assur, stands on the right shore of the Tigris about half way between Mosul and Bagdad. The ruins attracted the attention of the early excavators; Layard and Rassam dug into them without great success and traces of their work are still visible. Nine years ago the Germans, who are also digging at Babylon, began a systematic excavation. The results have been amazing. Dr. Maresch, now in charge of the work, hopes in two years more to complete it, but already a great part of the city has been laid bare.

The Germans gave us a hearty welcome, for travelers seldom pass that way. They have built a large house among the ruins by the side of the river. On the river is a launch to be used in case of trouble with the natives. The shore before the house is green with vines and trees, and opposite are the gardens. Entering the house, which is modeled after the palace of an Assyrian king, we find the large open court filled with cases of antiquities and with great stone monuments waiting to be packed. On the second floor are the living rooms, but if we climb to the roof we have the best view of the ruins.

Shergat consists of one great mound, nearly a mile in length and more than half as broad. Near the northwestern corner is a high conical peak representing the ancient temple tower. The double city wall has been uncovered. The parapet, even, remains, and along its outer edge are the small holes through which the Assyrian warriors of nearly four thousand years ago used to shoot their arrows at the enemy below. The city gates, winding so that the people without might not see through them into the city, have been uncovered. Temples constructed in honor of the god Assur and the goddess Ninip have been found and their plan revealed. While looking at their ruins, it requires but little imagination to see the statues of the deities on their pedestals, the altar before them with the smoke of the offerings rising heavenward, the long-robed priests officiating and the crowds of worshipers joining in the responsive chants. These temples have revealed a distinct picture of the early Assyrian worship.

There, too, are the palaces of the early kings, with large courts surrounded by chambers, similar to the modern house of Mosul. There were streets so narrow that two could scarcely walk abreast, but running through the center of the town was one wide, straight street, the Broadway of Assur, paved with marble blocks and lined along its sides with little drinking-houses and shops. Near the southern wall of the city was a public square which revealed as valuable treasures as any ever discovered in Mesopotamia. There was a veritable forest of stone monuments, a hundred or more great monoliths bearing the names and inscriptions of early Assyrian kings and nobles. Tradition tells us that Semiramis was the wife of Ninus, the founder of Nineveh, and long ago scholars agreed that she was a myth; but there, on one of the monuments, her name appears. When all of these royal inscriptions shall have been published and read, the greatest gaps in the history of the Biblical world will have been filled. Most interesting are the graves of the early Assyrians. They are great vaulted structures of stone which would be an ornament to any modern cemetery, and they were provided with heavy doors of stone which still turn on their sockets. More interesting still is the museum where the excavators have preserved and labeled their finds. Statues of the gods and kings, large monuments, bull deities, tablets, inscriptions, and jewels without number, form a collection rivaling those already in the great museums.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S HISTORIC APPEARANCE BEFORE CONGRESS WHICH BROKE THE ESTABLISHED PRECEDENT OF ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN YEARS

THE historic precedent that has stood for one hundred and thirteen years was broken by President Wilson on April 8, when he personally addressed the Sixty-fourth Congress of the United States. Not since President John Adams, dressed in knee breeches, silken hose, and velvet coat, and wearing a sword, stood before Congress to compare America's peace and prosperity with the ruin and desolation of France, just then emerging with Napoleon as First Consul from the wreck of its revolution, has any President of the United States personally addressed Congress.

There was no ceremony. Extreme and studied simplicity marked the whole event. At 12.50 P.M. President Wilson entered the assembly chamber, and all the members, as well as the gay throngs in the galleries, rose. The President shook hands with the Speaker and the Vice-President, and then took his stand at the rostrum just before the Speaker's desk while the crowd applauded loudly.

Speaker Clark rapped with his gavel, and when every one was seated, said:

"I have the distinguished honor of introducing the President of the United States."

The President bowed to the applause that greeted this introduction and immediately proceeded with the reading of his short message. His first paragraph was an explanation of his action. He said:

"I am very glad indeed to have this opportunity to address the two Houses directly and to verify for myself the impression that the President of the United States is a person, not a mere department of the government hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power, sending messages, not speaking naturally and with his own voice; that he is a human being trying to co-operate with other human beings in a common service. After this pleasant experience I shall feel quite normal in all our dealings with one another."

Taking up the subject of the tariff, the President said:

"I have called the Congress together in extraordinary session because a duty was laid upon the party now in power at the recent elections, which it ought to perform promptly, in order that the burden carried by the people under existing law may be lightened as soon as possible, and in order, also, that the business interests of the country may not be kept too long in suspense as to what the fiscal changes are to be to which they will be required to adjust themselves. . . .

"Aside from the duties laid upon articles which we do not, and probably cannot, produce, therefore, and the duties laid upon luxuries and merely for the sake of the revenues they yield, the object of the tariff duties henceforth laid must be effective competition, the whetting of American wits by contest with the wits of the rest of the world.

"It would be unwise to move toward this end headlong, with reckless haste, or with strokes that cut at the very roots of what has grown up amongst us by long process and at our own invitation. . . . We must make changes in our fiscal laws, in our fiscal system, whose object is development, a more free and wholesome development, not revolution or upset or confusion."

The new tariff bill is declared to be based on the principle that the government should "tax wealth, not poverty." The "necessities of life" are either put upon the free list or made the subject of heavy reductions. The duty on what may be classed as luxuries, even including silk and silk goods, is only slightly reduced. Precious stones, uncut, are taken from the free list and given a duty of 10 per cent. The duty on furs is also raised. The free list includes meats, bread, wheat, flour (except from countries which tax American flour), potatoes, milk, salt, fish, boots and shoes, coal, raw wool, lumber, leather, iron ore, wood pulp, printing paper not worth more than two and one-half cents a pound, agricultural implements, Bibles, typewriters, steel rails, cash registers, fence wire, and nails.

Radical reductions are made in butter, eggs, rice, fresh vegetables, apples, peaches, citrons, fruits, macaroni, beans, mineral water, manufactured woolens (including ready-made clothing, women's

Two days' journey up the Tigris River, but on the opposite shore, is Nimrud, the second capital city of Assyria. It is built upon the edge of a stony plateau. Its one great mound resembles the mound of Assur in shape, but it is less extensive. Near its northern edge is a conical peak representing the temple tower. Even now one may trace upon the surface of the mound the outlines of the three palaces of the great Assyrian kings. Those kings are mentioned by name in the Bible—Shalmaneser, Tiglath-pileser and Assurnasirpal. More than half a century ago, Layard excavated in their palaces and removed scores of sculptured slabs from their walls to the British Museum, but his work was slight. Only a few shallow holes were dug on the surface. In the palace of Assurnasirpal the passageways and chambers may be traced. One chamber shows above the surface the marble slabs which lined its four sides. In another chamber are two long cuneiform inscriptions exposed to the weather. When Nimrud shall have been excavated to its foundation, there will be a wealth of material dating from the days of the early Hebrew kings.

If we follow the river up to Mosul, and then travel toward the northeast for about three hours, we shall come to the third capital city of Assyria. Its ancient name was Dur Sharrukin, or the city of Sargon. The modern Arabs call it Khorsabad. It is now represented by a little village of mud huts at its base. Of all the Assyrian capitals the ruins of Khorsabad are the smallest and the least imposing; yet it has yielded treasures of great value. In 1842 M. Botta, the French consul at Mosul, who had dug in vain into the ruins of Nineveh, discovered here the palace of Sargon, king of Assyria from 722 to 705 B.C., the monarch who captured the Hebrew city of Samaria and transported the Israelites to Assyria. Upon the walls of the palace were scores of sculptured and inscribed slabs which were removed and sent to Paris. One of the inscriptions tells how Sargon captured Samaria, and gives even the number of the Israelites whom he took away. Probably the palace was as large as any ever constructed, for it covered twenty-seven acres of ground, and contained hundreds of chambers. The platform upon which it stood was eighty feet high. But the modern mound suggests little of this ancient magnificence.

I spent the night with the sheik of an Arab encampment just outside the city walls, and as we were eating, dipping our fingers, instead of forks, into the same dish of rice and roasted chicken, in Arab fashion, he told me of a stone which had recently been discovered. Some children had been digging for building stones in the wall, about a mile to the southeast of the palace, when about three feet from the surface they came upon a large stone lying flat upon the ground. It was covered with wedge-shaped marks. They believed that the stone must be filled with gold, or that it was the covering of a vault filled with treasures, and that he who could read the writing would possess the treasures. I asked the sheik to take me to the stone. Quickly we rode over the plain. Half-way up the slope of the mound formed by the falling wall was a hole about ten feet square. We dismounted; the sheik dug away a little dirt, and there appeared the bit of a great white marble stone all covered with large cuneiform signs, each of which was two inches long. I urged the sheik to dig away more of the dirt, but he would not. Why should this stranger from Frankistan, one not of the true faith, come here and read the inscription and take the hidden treasure away? I only saw enough of the stone to convince me that it had once lined a gateway of Sargon's city, that it had fallen from its place, and that it bore an inscription of great historical value.

Quickly the sheik covered the stone over with dirt, lest I should see too much, and then he looked inquiringly at me to learn if I had discovered its secret. There the stone and its secret must lie until it is broken up by the Arabs for lime, or smuggled away by some European, or removed by the Turks to the museum in Constantinople.

AN IMPROVISED RELIEF KITCHEN

A HASTILY MADE BOAT DOING RESCUE WORK

LUDLOW STREET, DAYTON, AFTER THE FLOOD

HELPING FLOOD VICTIMS TO START LIFE ANEW

WITH the Federal Government and the united charity of America backing its efforts, the State of Ohio is bending all its energies to the rehabilitation of the flooded Ohio Valley. Throughout the flooded sections of Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky and West Virginia relief measures are fully organized and are being carried forward speedily and efficiently. Ohio's loss has now been fully ascertained, it is believed, and the figures presented in Washington a short time ago are as follows: Lives lost, 350; homes destroyed, 4,200; persons homeless, 40,500; homes and families outside of Dayton, Columbus and Cincinnati in need of rehabilitation, 9,000. The same despatch states that the emergency relief situation in each of the flooded districts is being well covered. Dayton, Columbus, Piqua, Troy, Ottawa, Sidney, Hamilton, Miamisburg, Middletown and Zanesville are all central stations for representatives of the organized relief. In all of these places information is being accumulated as rapidly as possible on which to base the distribution of funds for the repair and rebuilding of homes and the re-establishment of business. Major Normoyle, who is at the head of the army relief forces in the flooded region, reports that he is confident that the situation is well in hand. Major Evans reported from Cincinnati that all the stricken towns had competent medical men and sufficient supplies for the time, at least. Surgeon Evans's report referred only to the immediate needs, relating solely to food, clothing, shelter and the prevention of epidemics. Such despatches as the following, that comes from Hamilton, Ohio, have been well authenticated by the reports of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S special representative, Mr. John Kabel. James K. Cullen, chairman of the Citizen's Relief Committee at Hamilton, makes the following appeal: "In the widespread flood disaster the country and the press have failed duly to appreciate the extent of Hamilton's affliction. This city was visited by an overwhelming flood on March 25 that destroyed hundreds of houses, causing a loss of life estimated at upwards of three hundred persons, and a loss of property estimated at $10,000,000, and rendering thousands of persons homeless and destitute. Our people are brave and confident of the future, but prosperous citizens are unable to give relief to our working people. We appeal in their behalf." Mr. Kabel describes vividly the conditions which prevail in Dayton, and which are, in degree, duplicated in all the flooded towns and cities. On his arrival there with the relief train that carried THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S first consignment of relief, he found that the water had gone from many parts of the city, but that complete ruin was left behind. Throughout the business district every window on the lower floors was broken, and the current of the flood had passed through with such force as to sweep absolutely clean the interiors of the stores and offices. Such was the force of the water that a great stone lion twice life size that was mounted on a great square granite pedestal before the High School was toppled over and left lying on its side in the mud. The asphalt and concrete pavements of the streets were torn up in great strips and blocks, and these had been whirled into heaps and carried into the interior of buildings, smashing everything in their path. The bodies of over 1,500 horses were found in the streets when the floods went down, and how the human inhabitants of the city escaped, Mr. Kabel says, is an unfathomable mystery. He said no one would have been surprised to learn that the death list had reached ten thousand. such were the conditions that prevailed throughout the days when the water was at its height. Mr. Kabel was full of the highest praise for the efforts put forth by the Citizens' Relief Committee, of which Mr. John H. Patterson, the president of the National Cash Register Company, is chairman. From the workshops of that company flat-bottomed boats for the rescue work were turned out at the rate of one every ten minutes, and were immediately rushed into service. Large numbers of people were rescued by these boats, and encouragement was given to others who saw them plying on their mission of rescue, and so many lives were saved. Following the advice of the Dayton pastors, to whom telegrams were sent as soon as the news of the flood reached us, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S relief work for the city of Dayton will be combined with that of the Citizens' Relief Committee. For the smaller towns and country places we will attempt to distribute all funds that reach us so as to alleviate suffering and poverty. If you wish to aid in this work send your contribution to the Western Flood Relief Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

WAITING FOR FOOD SUPPLIES IN DAYTON'S BREAD-LINE OF FLOOD VICTIMS

THE FORGOTTEN SECRET

A SERMON

By

Rev. J. L. Campbell, D.D.*

TEXT: "Lord, teach us to pray." Luke 11: 1

THERE is no one subject in all the realm of Christian thought that is more often or earnestly on the lips of God's people than that of the place and importance of prayer. It meets us everywhere. We hear it at every devotional gathering. However inexperienced a Christian is in other respects, and however limited his knowledge, yet on this subject at least he feels competent to speak. It is the theme and burden also of many of our hymns. We sing of prayer as our vital breath, our native air, our passport into heaven, and how the enemy trembles when "he sees the weakest saint upon his knees." To speak upon this theme, therefore, may seem to be trite even to commonplace.

Yet, when Mr. Tyndall proposed his celebrated prayer test a few years ago, the wide confusion of answers that were given by even intelligent Christians, the variety of opinions and proposals evoked, only showed how little after all this subject is really understood. We have every complexion of opinion, from that of the late George Müller, of Bristol, who professedly never asked anything from any one to help him in his great work—who claimed that he simply asked God for the money and the money came—every grade of opinion from that down to the theory of the late F. W. Robertson of Brighton, who saw in prayer simply the reflexive influence, the calming, tranquillizing effect which its exercise produces on our own spirits. He saw in it nothing objective, nothing external to ourselves.

The Reasonableness of Prayer

Many devout people, also, while they rejoice in believing in the efficacy and power of prayer, have very vague and undefined views on the subject. They pray at random, not knowing what percentage of their prayers they should expect to be answered, or, indeed, if any of them will ever be fully realized. Now, if God will enable us to get a clearer vision of this subject—if, by the breath of his Spirit, he will blow away the mists that have gathered around the mountain of prayer, so that we can see its boundaries and trace its outlines more clearly, then our study will not be in vain. Let us first approach our subject broadly.

I. Consider the reasonableness of prayer. The difficulty urged against prayer from the so-called scientific standpoint is that the world is governed by law, and, we are asked, is it reasonable to suppose that God is going to violate, modify, or change natural law in answer to our requests? There is a great deal of loose and careless thinking along these lines.

(1) In the first place, the supernatural never involves a suspension or violation of any law. It means simply the interjecting of a new power. A stone falls to the ground according to a certain well-known velocity. This is in accordance with the established law of gravitation. But sometimes a stone is seen rising from the ground and shooting up into the air. The regular process of nature is reversed. It is a supernatural, an above-nature, act. But when the lad tosses the stone into the air he does not suspend or violate the law of gravitation. He simply interjects a new force which reverses the ordinary procedure of the uniformities about us. But there is more than this.

(2) We must never think of law as a separate, independent or self-executing entity that goes on without reference to its Author. "At bottom law is will. The law of the State is the will of the State; the law of an individual is the will of an individual; the law of nature is the will of the Author of nature. All the fluctuations of storm and calm, of summer and winter, of rain and sunshine, rest directly on the will of God. His will touches me on every side. I see it changing in the clouds every day. Why may it not change in regard to me so as to answer my prayer?"

It is remarkable how all objections to prayer vanish and how natural it is to pray when some great crisis comes. At the darkest hour of the Civil War, when the fate of this country seemed to be trembling in an uncertain balance, the government proclaimed a fast. People flocked to their churches in immense throngs. Men and women seldom seen in places of worship betook themselves there. An eminent civilian in one of our Atlantic cities, who was a stranger to the house of God, went there with the rest and was seen devoutly kneeling with God's people. Asked what brought him to such a service, he replied, "I thought it was high time to get help somewhere. We are in a tight place, and we need it." It is marvelous how reasonable prayer seems in these circumstances. Men that think but little of God at other times, when loss, sickness, trial, danger come, and they find themselves in a "tight place," at once betake themselves to prayer. In great emergencies we go straight as an arrow to the mark.

Much of the disappointment in regard to prayer arises because there is not kept in mind

II. The limitations of prayer. (1) The first thing God asks an unconverted man to pray for is the salvation of his soul. It is written in Psalm 66: 18, "If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me." In Prov. 28: 9 we read, "He that turneth away his ear from hearing the law, even his prayer shall be abomination." "The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." God alone knows it. Therefore, we find in the Book of Proverbs several times that "the sacrifices of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord." If this, then, is the state of the natural heart, we may ask, "Who can bring sweet water out of a bitter fountain, or that which is acceptable unto God out of that which is sinful in his sight?"

Fully recognizing the truth of this, we must not fall into the opposite error and claim that an unconverted man must not pray at all. Of Simon the Sorcerer, Peter says: "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter: for thy heart is not right in the sight of God. Repent, therefore, of this thy wickedness, and pray God that perhaps the thought of thine heart may be forgiven thee, for I perceive thou art in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity." (Acts 8: 21-23.) "Pray God." Let a man but feel the burden of his sin, and he cannot help crying out for mercy. But so far as I can discover all through the Bible, this is the first object for which a sinner is instructed to plead. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness and all other things shall be added unto you." After he has been born again, the whole Bible blossoms forth with promises for him. An unconverted man is, therefore, limited in the first instance to prayer for the salvation of his soul.

(2) Another limitation to prayer is that it is to be offered in Jesus' name, in behalf of his work. This is taught us all through the Bible by symbol, by example, by direct statement. Right on the threshold of the Old Testament, Abel draws near to God with his sacrificial lamb; life offered up for life; innocency dying for guilt; and, clothed in a coat of sacrificial skin, he was accepted. Cain came with the offering of a sheaf of grain—his own works, the sweat of his brow, the labor of his hands, salvation worked out by himself—and he was rejected. Cain- and Abel-worship are the two that have ever existed in the world—the one says "do," and the other says "done." Yon golden-covered box in the Holiest had to be sprinkled seven times with blood, and the ground before it was sprinkled seven times with blood, after which the high priest stood over these drops of blood and made intercession before the Mercy Seat for himself and for the sins of the people.

In the Name of Christ

In John 14: 14, Jesus says to his disciples: "If ye ask anything in my name, I will do it." The whole weight of Christ's character, work, and mediation is, therefore, cast into the scale of our petition. A pauper might enter one of our banks and present a check in his own name, but he would be unceremoniously pushed aside. Let this beggar's check, however, be endorsed by one of our greatest millionaires, and it would be honored in the hands of this poor man up to the value of the last dollar that the millionaire possessed. Christ's name, signed by his own hand, written with his own blood, endorses the prayer that is in accordance with his will. This places Calvary back of it. Prayer, then, ceases to be ours and becomes his, and is presented as such before the throne. The question in the last analysis is whether God will answer the call which he himself has prompted; whether he will do what he has encouraged his people to ask. Has he said, and shall he not accomplish it? Let us prove him now herewith.

(3) Prayer is further limited to the promises of God. Ezekiel says: "I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them." "For this," and if you read back in the chapter you will find what is signified by the "this" here mentioned. An inquiring Christian determined to put God's promises to the test. He took a single promise and presented it before God, and when he received an answer he wrote on the margin of his Bible "verified." In a few years it was wonderful to look at that book. Promise after promise throughout its pages had the word "verified" written opposite it. He knew the Bible was true because he had tested it, and found experimentally that God fulfilled his Word. It is therefore of the utmost importance that we should base our petitions on distinct, correctly quoted promises. We should be sure that the promise covers the whole ground of our request and that the prayer rests clearly upon it. Whenever we cannot get a promise to put under our petitions, we may be sure that there is something wrong.

Our Way—Or a Better Way

(4) Another limitation to prayer is that God reserves to himself the time and manner of answering it. It may be after we are sleeping in our graves. It may be directly, as when Peter was liberated from prison. It may be indirectly, as in the case of Paul's thorn in the flesh. God will answer our requests directly, or he will do something better. Suppose a man had a great burden fastened to his shoulders. There are two ways in which he might be relieved. The direct method would be to cut the bands that bound the weight to his back and let it fall to the ground, and thus set him free. The indirect method would be to impart to the man so much additional strength that the burden would cease to be a burden at all. You can at once see that the latter would be the greater blessing. The lame man at the Beautiful Gate of the temple expected simply an alms. He did not get what he was looking for, but he got something far better. He was made every whit whole.

> It may not be my way,
> It may not be thy way,
> And yet in his own way
> The Lord will provide.

Every tear from the eye of faith will be bottled up. The unfulfilled fragments of the prayers of the saints in the past will be all gathered. No part will be lost. Every jot and tittle of what is promised in God's Book will be fulfilled. Even in our adversities he may be answering our prayers.

(5) Lastly, notice that prayer is to be accompanied with the use of the divinely appointed means. This was the fallacy of Tyndall's proposed prayer test. It is the defect in what Müller claimed. While he did not directly solicit help for his orphanages, he yet published his reports and distributed them abroad—in other words, he made his wants known to God's people, just as he should do, and they responded. "And why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" Luke 6: 46.) We are not only to pray, "Lord, Lord," but we are also to do the things that God has commanded us. Prayer without the use of means when this is possible is presumption.

Spurgeon was once asked the secret of his success. He paused thoughtfully for a moment, and then solemnly answered, "I believe what I preach, and I pray." The soldiers plaited the crown of thorns and put it on Christ's brow, and bowed before him and addressed him with words of adoration on their lips which they did not mean. How far are we away from the mockery of these soldiers when we too kneel before the Christ and ascribe to him titles and honors and worship and adoration that our hearts do not feel? Instead of prayer, how often it is only the mockery of the Roman soldiers that is offered to God. Of Epaphras, Paul

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, April 27. James 4: 5-12. One way to help to slay an unworthy disposition is to refuse to give it utterance. Expression always ventilates ill-feeling and strengthens it. We can help to smother it by refusing it fresh air. When we give a bad feeling speech, or gesture, or act, we establish it on its throne. Give it no outward senses or communication and we make it sicken and we hasten its death.

And thus it is with envy. "The spirit within us lusteth to envy." And the apostle adds, "Speak not evil one of another." If this bad feeling of envy has stolen into the soul refuse it attention, offer it no courtesy, cut it dead! Kill it by negligence. "Make no provision for the flesh:" starve it out! If we take this course we immediately cripple our evil impulses and we triumphantly help in their destruction.

This is a great law of life which it is wise to learn early and always to heed. Evil feelings come to us clamoring for notice. Recognition feeds them: they pine away in neglect. Let us take no notice of them! Let us just mention the matter to our Father in heaven. Let us shut every door, including the door of the lips, and let us leave them to their certain fate. We need not worry. If we desire to slay them, and if we shut all the doors, and leave them to God, the evil things will hasten away to death.

MONDAY, April 28. Genesis 39: 20-23. "And the Lord was with Joseph." And yet immediately after this I read the words: "And Joseph's master took him, and put him into the prison." And so I learn that the fellowship of God will not keep me from dark places and troublesome roads. The Lord's promise is not the assurance of ease but a covenant of unbroken friendship. It is not a pledge that he will keep me from the prison, but that in the prison he will be with me. It is not that he will save me from sorrow but that he will share it. It is not that all my antagonisms shall cease, but that they shall be overruled for my spiritual and eternal good. And thus the greater wonder is not that Joseph was cast into prison but that Almighty God lodged there with him.

I must not therefore be dismayed when the way of life runs underground. I must not be deceived into assuming that God has deserted me because my enemies are multiplied. The hostility of circumstances does not mean the unfriendliness of God. When I pass from the "green pastures" into "the valley of the shadow," where the wild beasts hide, I need "fear no evil," for the Lord is with me. The darkness is not an orphanage, it is my Father's house. When Joseph was locked up in prison his God was not locked out.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage.

"And the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy."

TUESDAY, April 29. Genesis 40: 9-15. Who would have imagined that by means of a dream Joseph would march forward to freedom and ascendancy? No material force battered at his prison-gate to give him liberty. The way of emancipation began in a dream! So silently and secretly does the Lord achieve his purposes. When we are altogether unconscious of his doings he is mightily at work at the very heart of things. He inspired a dream in a prisoner and momentous issues were born! He breathed upon a sleeping soul, and ultimately "kingdoms were moved." Who can trace out the path of the Almighty to perfection?

Having inspired the dream the Lord inspires the interpreter. He fashions the lock and he provides the key. "Lo, he also is wise." He moves from step to step under the enlightenment of his sovereign purpose and will. There are no lost links in the chain of his design. After the dreamer will come the interpreter.

Joseph pleaded with the butler to remember him and "bring me out of this house." Little did he know that in the dream itself was a power that would open the prison door. God was already at work while it seemed as though no answer had been given to Joseph's prayer. Heaven was busy while yet all things appeared indifferent and asleep. Let me repeat it, a great emancipation began in a secret dream.

WEDNESDAY, April 30. Genesis 40: 16-23. "Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgat him." So speedily do we forget our benefactors. We receive the gifts but we retain no honored niche for the giver. Some kindly helper unties the knot, and brings our soul out of entanglement; but our freedom drugs us, and we forget our emancipation. That is the pity of it: our benefits act like opiates and they lull our memories into deep sleep.

All this is at its worst in our relations to the Lord. "His tender mercies are over all his works," but they influence our souls like a narcotic, and we "forget all his benefits." What blessings attend us every hour, and yet they have no spiritual significance! Or if they awake us for a moment we are soon asleep again. The miracle of yesterday is forgotten to-day.

Now what we need is the sanctification of memory. We need that memory should do its appointed work in a hallowed way. Memory must retain its treasures and honor and revere the benefactors. And for this we have the promised help of the Holy Spirit. "He shall bring to your remembrance." He shall keep the memory in robust and sacred health, so that we may forget what we ought not to remember, and remember what we ought not to forget.

THURSDAY, May 1. Proverbs 2: 1-9. "The Lord giveth wisdom," says the Proverbs. "If any man lack wisdom let him ask of God," says the apostle James. We go to God for strength, and for comfort, and for peace, but here we are encouraged to go to God for ideas, for judgment, for vision. The Lord who lays the passions to sleep can also illumine the mind. He not only provides "arbors of rest" along the road, he is also willing to light up the road with his own lamps. He is ready to engage himself in our problem and to direct us in our conclusions. "The Lord giveth wisdom."

And what is the condition of receiving the wisdom? "If thou seekest her as silver, and searchest for her as for hid treasure." But could not the Lord have given me the wisdom on easier terms? No; wisdom given without search would never be valued. Indeed it would never be known as treasure. And besides this, wisdom easily gained would not discipline and refine our powers of discovery. The reward of research is found not only in the treasure, but in the sharpened wits and discernments. I find the silver, but I also gain a better tool.

So I am to seek for wisdom from God. I am to watch vigilantly if perchance the needed lamp may be hidden somewhere in my circumstances. I never know where the light may break forth! So must I seek it through prayer, and meditation, and by the way of every recognized duty.

FRIDAY, May 2. I Peter 2: 18-25. When we suffer wrongfully and "take it patiently" we extract treasure from the mines of the enemy. We are always triumphant when we make our circumstances enrich our souls. The question of vital victory or defeat is settled by the conditions of the soul. How has this particular experience left us? Are we more gracious? Are we more patient? Have we a richer intimacy with the Lord? Can we enter more deeply into the purpose of his passion? If so, then we are conquerors indeed. We have made spoil of our antagonists. We may have suffered wrongfully, but we have made the very harrow the servant of a richer spiritual harvest.

So my problem should be always this: How can I make this circumstance pour treasure into my soul? How can I make this cloud of disappointment distil the dews of gentleness? How can I make this personal injury add to the fruits of my spirit? This is the art of heavenly living, and such life can be lived in the strength of Christ.

We offer a splendid witness to the Master when our sufferings add to our spiritual beauties. When a wrong is so taken that it adds new tracery to the temple of the soul we bring great glory to the Master's name.

SATURDAY, May 3. I Kings 3: 3-12. In his dream Solomon asked the Lord God for "a hearing heart." There are hearts that are deaf and obtuse. They are like defective telephonic receivers, they cannot register fine vibrations. They do not perceive the difference between subtlety and truth, between easy compromise and shining honor. They know the distinction between obtrusive vices and obtrusive virtues, but they are not scrupulous in their discernments. And so people of this kind are easily "taken in." The evil one entices them by lures to which they are dull and insensitive. He catches them just where they are not alert. And so Solomon asked for "a hearing heart," a heart that could discern the faintest approach and interpret it. He asked for a power of judgment that should be like a keen blade, able to separate things that differ, in order that he might choose according to the will of God.

The great peril is the deaf heart, the heart that is slow at recognition, and which discerns only when it is too late. We need the prospective heart, the heart that understands afar off, which sees things coming, and interprets the will of God. And this heart is the gift of God. It is not the reward of culture. It is not the possession of the privileged. We obtain it by the grace of God. "Because thou hast asked this thing . . . lo, I have given thee a wise and an understanding heart."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

tells the Colossians (4: 12) that he was "always agonizing" for them in his prayers. How much of this agony in prayer is found in the churches to-day?

You have observed that the Syrophœnician woman never prayed in behalf of her daughter. She cried out, "Lord help me, my daughter is grievously vexed with a demon." And again imploringly she cast herself before the Master's feet and pleaded: "Lord, help me." Ah! she had linked her very soul to the soul of her daughter. For her there was no peace, no joy, no happiness, if I might say it reverently, no heaven even, unless her daughter was saved. That is what prayer means.

Think of Christmas Evans setting apart a whole day in which to wrestle with God to take away from him the formalism that he felt characterized his work. And he continued in prayer until, as he himself says, "The fetters loosened, the old hardness softened, the mountains of frost and snow dissolved and melted within him." "Then," he says, "I resigned myself to Christ, body and soul, gifts and labor, all my life, every day and every hour that remained for me, and all my case I committed to Christ." Think of Jonathan Edwards in 1737, alighting from his horse in the woods and retiring alone to a solitary place and spending hours wrestling with God. "I felt," he says, "an ardency of soul to be what I know not otherwise how to express —emptied, annihilated, to lie in the dust, to become full of Christ alone; to love him with a holy and pure love; to trust him; to live upon him; to serve him, and be perfectly sanctified and made pure with a divine and heavenly power." Think of Charles G. Finney, as they tell us, "asking his host to let him sleep in the barn rather than sleep in a comfortable bed in the house, that he might spend the night on his knees praying for power with souls the next night." Think of George McGregor, of whom

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

An Historical Event

ALTHOUGH for more than a hundred years it has been the custom of our Presidents to send in their messages to be read in Congress, President Wilson supplied a pleasing innovation to the country when he orally delivered his initial message on the tariff to both Houses in joint session on April 8. It was a thing that had not happened since the days of Washington and Adams. In his prelude he explained, in a few brief sentences, the reason, saying that he wished "to verify for himself the impression that the President of the United States is a person, not a mere department of the government, hailing Congress from some isolated island of jealous power; sending, not speaking naturally and with his own voice; that he is a human being trying to co-operate with other human beings in the common service." This, which was in the spirit of his inaugural, was expressed with the utmost simplicity and gives a new note to the relations existing between Congress and the executive. His plan unquestionably has its advantages, and as he is an accomplished speaker and ready debater, it is obvious that his presence as a reinforcement of his official views may at times prove very desirable. We take no account of those who would give it the aspect of a "speech from the throne." Mr. Wilson is too good an American to have had any other aim in view than the establishment of more familiar relations with Congress, which would facilitate legislation and do away with unnecessary red tape.

The Case of Mrs. Pankhurst

IT IS not a pleasing picture to contemplate the woman suffrage situation in England just now. In a score or more jails there are "martyrs" of the cause, proud of their distinction, yet eager for freedom and determined to win it by way of the hunger strike. Mrs. Pankhurst, who has just been sentenced to three years' penal servitude, has declared that she will prove that the punishment cannot be carried out. She has started a hunger strike and has said: "They will have to let me die or let me go." To allow her to escape the consequences of her acts is a thing the British Government is not disposed to do; on the other hand, to permit her to sacrifice her life under prison rules and compulsory feeding would be regarded as a calamity. It is clearly a dilemma which the government would gladly avoid. It does not seem to have occurred to them that perhaps a policy of moderate concession might go much farther than coercion in solving the problem and ending the suffrage warfare. In all probability the forcible feeding system will have to be abandoned and some more humane treatment adopted than has yet been devised.

The Leafless Bible

A TEXAS reader of this paper has sent us for comment a sermon preached by a San Antonio pastor lately, in which the Higher Criticism was reviewed and approved as a factor in religious progress, and which demonstrated, doubtless to his own satisfaction, if not to that of his hearers, the superiority of the theological attitude which consists largely of exploiting or rejecting Scripture in a way that must have puzzled some members of his congregation. The case reminds us of the story of the pastor who, having finished a course of sermons on Bible criticism, was visited in his study by one of the earnest workers in his church. His caller began by asking what he should now do with the Bible. "Why, read it, of course," was the reply. "But," said the visitor, "I don't just know what to do about it, so I came to ask your advice." And he produced, as he spoke, a Bible, which he opened and laid before the smiling pastor. "Why," said the latter, "there is nothing here, John—nothing left of it. How is that?" "Well," was John's answer, "you see, it's this way: you told us that the stories of the Creation and the Flood were largely myths and that the patriarchs were legendary figures, so out went Genesis. Then, you told us the Pentateuch was chiefly folk lore and ancient le, ds, and out went those books too. Ruth was a pastoral, you said, and then there was a bunch of Jewish history books, with more or less legendary contents, and out they went, like the rest. Job, you told us, was a dramatic composition, just a play; the Psalms were simply the Jewish hymnal; Proverbs and Ecclesiastes were the wisdom of the ancients gathered from everywhere, and the Song of Solomon was nothing but a wedding song, so out they went with the rest. To make the story short, pastor, you cast so much doubt on all of the other books that I just had to tear them out one by one until there was precious little left but the covers. You've destroyed my faith in the inspiration of the old Book and now, I ask you again, what I am to do about it?"

The preacher was thunderstruck at this result of the series of discourses upon which he had spent so much precious time and so much erudite care. "Why, John," said he, in a voice that had a quaver in it, "I think you'd better get the old Bible and read it as you did before. Though it may have human errors in it, it is still the voice of God speaking to man, and the only message we have to teach us the way of salvation."

So it is to-day with pastors who are assailing the old Bible. They pull down and do not build up; they take away and do not restore; they speculate and criticize and do not interpret like faithful ministers. Thank God, the number of such is small. Biblical criticism has been defined as "the scholar's lens." In the hands of the wise pastor, it need not be unacceptable, nor should it impair his spiritual usefulness, if he has the Gospel in his own heart and is stirred by the love of souls. He will find that constructive—not destructive—criticism is healthful in expounding the message of the Book. But the preacher who believes he is called to a special mission to substitute new Biblical standards for the old assumes a tremendous responsibility. Instead of bringing joy to his hearers, such a mission is more likely to bring "chaos out of order."

Invisible Helpers

WHEN a team is fast in the mire another team, hitched to the one in distress, will usually bring it out. Many an automobilist has been saved from utter defeat in a bit of miry road by a friendly farmer's horses or oxen. Many a pedestrian has been rescued from ditch or morass by a strong hand reached down by some one on solid ground. Assistance not unlike this often comes in one's mental or spiritual life. We are in perplexity so deep that our own resources fail. A friend comes along adding his wisdom to ours, his faith to ours, his strength of will to ours, and we are helped through the difficult place. It may be said that in the realm of the spirit there is no need of outward assistance, since all the resources of omnipotence are at th command of the trustful soul. But it has been de creed by omniscience that in spiritual as well a physical and mental matters we are to help one an other. The greatest saints urge their friends an companions, as Paul did, to pray for them. H could follow a majestic passage of counsel and ex hortation with the humble, human plea, "Brethrer pray for us."

But it is not only our friends on earth who ca come to our aid in times of need. The friends on th other side help us too. Did you never try, in time of stress, the plan of naming over in you thought the holy friends you have known who ar now in the presence of the King? You think o them, pure, stalwart, radiant, marching on, witl uplifted faces, fighting the celestial battles o Jehovah as they fought his earthly battles, singin his praises there as they sang them here. Two b two you may picture them, following their King Before you know it your heart begins to beat in th rhythm of their step, your faith springs to vigor, flash leaps to your eye, a song to your lip—and th difficult place is passed in triumph.

Or you may think of some of the giants of th past whom you never saw or heard, but whose live and deeds you know. You see Paul, impetuous, de termined, treading almost alone that trail througl Asia Minor and Eastern Europe along which th churches of later centuries sprang up; you se Savonarola and Huss and Wyckliff and Knox an Wesley following their Master in the teeth of bitte opposition on into the flames of martyrdom; yo fancy you feel the grip of rough Martin Luther hand upon your arm and hear him sing: "A mighty fortress is our God." And you smile at the timid ity or the doubts of the moment before, and spring forward again into the present battle.

It is truly a noble fellowship to which we ar called and in which we toil and fight. They chal lenge us to faith and courage; they dare us to at tempt still greater tasks; they offer us their aid a we contemplate their strivings and their triumphs

> For all the saints, who from their labors rest,
> Who thee by faith before the world confessed,
> Thy name, O Jesus, be forever blessed.

General Notes

—ON APRIL 10 the cable advices from Rome reported tha Pope Pius X was very dangerously ill. For several days previous to that date it had been known that the Pope was ill, bu even in spite of his advanced years no expectation of seriou illness was aroused. The reports of the 9th state that th doctors were with their patient all night and that artificia stimulation was necessary to keep him alive. Later they announced: "We are enabled to announce a notable improvemen in the Pope's condition after yesterday's relapse." Diplomat accredited to the Holy See that day telegraphed to their gov ernments that the Pope's death was a question of days, perhap of hours. Moreover, the Eucharistic Congress at Malta i likely to be postponed. It is generally believed that the officia statements are altogether too hopeful, and that they are simply an attempt to conceal the truth.

—A RECENT DESPATCH from Peking says the first parliament of the world's youngest republic was inaugurated on April 8 amid general rejoicings, not only in the Chinese capital, but throughout the country. The scene of the gathering of the joint inaugural session of the members of the Senate and the House of Representatives was a remarkable one. Five hundred representatives out of a total of 596, and 177 Senator out of 274, all of them earnest looking men of mature years, and nearly all dressed in European fashion, silently awaited the appointed hour of opening. As the clock struck 11 several bands played the national anthem, while the assemblage rose to its feet. The senior member of the House of Representatives then made a few congratulatory remarks, and formally declared both houses open. Scenes of enthusiastic jubilation followed before an adjournment was taken till April 12. The proceedings were very brief and simple, but earnest and impressive, and were watched with interest by the large number of foreigners who packed the galleries. The American charge d'affaires has intimated to the Chinese Government that recognition of the republic by the United States will be made when the parliamentary officers have been appointed and quorum declared. Brazil and Mexico, it is said, will act at the same time with the United States. The other Powers will probably defer action until after the election of the President, which will be several months hence. It is officially announced that Peru has recognized the Chinese Republic.

Tablet to Washington Irving

ON APRIL 3, the birthday of Washington Irving, the St. Nicholas Society of New York, of which Irving was one of the founders, celebrated the anniversary by presenting to the Washington Irving High School of New York City a bronze tablet of the genial pioneer of American letters. The memorial is the work of Victor Brenner, and is in the form of a fine bas-relief medallion of the author, representing him at the age of thirty-seven. William D. Murphy of the society delivered an address on the life and services of Washington Irving. Walter L. Suydam, president of the society, tendered the tablet to the city. Frank D. Wilsey, chairman of the building committee, accepted it for the board of education; John Greene accepted it for the high school committee, and Miss Cherie Freeman, a young lady of the junior class of the school, easily carried off the honors of the day by her speech accepting the tablet for the Washington Irving High School. Thomas M. Churchill of the board of education made the principal address of the day, ably recounting Irving's literary characteristics and the splendid service rendered to the nation. Among other things, he said, referring to the author's cheerfulness:

The world wants cheerfulness. It is the oil that lubricates the wheels of life. The schools need cheerfulness; it is the lure that draws children from the street. Youth is the time of brightness, of sunshine, of geniality. That girl or woman, boy or man, who lets loose upon the bright time of youth, its schooldays, any of the darkness of hate, or dislike, or envy, or jealousy, or meanness, or unkindness, commits a civic misdemeanor. Let him or her consider the life of the great man, born one hundred and thirty years ago to-day, who lives forever in the hearts of Americans not so much because he was the great biographer of Mahomet, Goldsmith and Washington; not so much because he was the historian of the American Revolution; not so much because he described the regions of the world; but because in his books and in his life he was genial, companionable, frank and kindly and true. . . .

At the close of the exercises in the auditorium the entire company of 3,000 massed in the street in front of the entrance, while President Suydam drew the flag from the tablet. The song "Washington Irving" and the shrill cheer of the schoolgirls brought great crowds of curious passersby to the unusual sight. Washington Irving was one of the most beautiful characters American literature has produced. He has shown that a man to be a genius in letters does not need to let down in habit or morals on any side. He was one of the cleanest and best men the nation has had. He was a devout Christian with belief in the Bible, intense personal love for Christ and the most perfect devotion to the church. His pastor, Rev. Dr. Spencer, now between ninety and a hundred years old, says Mr. Irving took up the offering every Sunday at the Episcopal Church in Tarrytown, while he lived at Sunnyside near by, and that no heart was ever more loyal to his minister or church than the distinguished author. It was his genuine goodness of character and beneficence of spirit that was breathed from his life, and flowed from his pen. The estimate of the public and the unveiling of the tablet attest the truth of the psalmist:

The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. (Ps. 112: 6.)

Motto Saves Girl's Money

A CHILD'S bank with "In God we trust" printed across the top and containing $30 in dimes, was left untouched by a burglar who rifled the home of Harry L. Kraemer the other night. After searching thoroughly and finding little for his trouble, the marauder came upon the little bank, which belongs to Kraemer's ten-year-old daughter. After examining it, the burglar evidently decided he would leave the house empty-handed rather than take the child's savings, so under the inscription, "In God we trust," he scribbled, "So did I—once," and departed. The motto awakened memories of days of faith gone by and stirred his conscience to condemn his wicked deeds. It would be well if the stirring of his conscience could be something more than temporary, but it is hardly likely that it will be permanent, as there is godly sorrow, intense faith, moral regeneration and reform necessary to save a life steeped in sin. There can be no other hope than these joined with faith in Christ for any one who is a slave to any kind of sin. The apostle Paul's suggestion and warning on the subjects of faith, good conscience and apostasy are expressed in these words:

Holding faith, and a good conscience; which some having put away concerning faith have made shipwreck. (I Tim. 1: 19.)

Popular Election of Senators

THE State Department received a telegram April 8, telling of the action of the Connecticut Legislature in ratifying the constitutional amendment providing for the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people in the States. Connecticut is the thirty-sixth of the forty-eight States of the Union to approve the amendment, thus assuring the three-fourths required. The provisions of the latest addition to the Constitution will probably be tried out first in Maryland, where a fight is on to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Senator Isidor Rayner. Although the subject of the popular election of Senators has been agitated for more than sixty years, it was not until June 24, 1911, that the Senate was induced for the first time in its history to give its consent to the change. On that day it voted to submit to the States the proposed amendment. In the experimental stage of our republic our fathers thought it best to have a House of Senators, meaning old men, removed somewhat from the wave of popular sentiment, but the people have shown such ability to rule themselves wisely that they have concluded to select this apparently more sober department of government by the direct vote of the people. In olden times monarchies were the only form of government that could long exist. The Jewish theocracy had in it, however, the element of popular rights. Those rights of the people are suggested by Hushai, the friend of David, who said:

Whom the Lord, and this people, and all the men of Israel, choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide. (II Sam. 16: 18.)

Record Sunday School Attendance

IT IS claimed that Miss Susan Steed of Middletown, Conn., holds the world's record for Sunday school attendance. She has been present to answer to her name in the roll call of the Sunday school of the North Congregational Church every Sabbath for twenty-five years. The condition of health that would permit such a regularity of attendance is rare, for which Miss Steed should and no doubt does feel grateful. There are many as constant in their dispositions and as devoted in their religious affections who are tripped up now and then by some assault of disease and kept out of day or Sabbath school, or from some important duty. There are multitudes, however, who have health who do not have the disposition or constancy indicated by the Sunday school scholar who did not miss a single service in a quarter of a century. What a lamentable lack of constancy there is in human nature and endeavor! The paths of life in every calling, business, trade, or profession are strewn with failures for the want of persistency. Nowhere is the failure from inconstancy seen more than in the religious world. The young man turns over a new leaf the first of January, but by the first of April his page records the fool's failure. The young lady determines that she will live a life of industry, of benevolence, and of piety, and finds herself very soon drifting into the habits of indolence, selfishness and worldliness. Husbands and wives say to each other, "We are drifting away from the teaching of our childhood. We will go back." They do finely for a few weeks or months, and the Sunday newspaper is so large and the automobile is so swift and the weather so fine and the friends so charming that they drop back into their old habits again. Miss Steed enforces the lesson of constancy in Sunday school attendance, which is one of the most importunate needs of the church at the present time. Miss Steed's twenty-five years of uninterrupted attendance at Sunday school is a most beautiful example and eloquent sermon on constancy in the study of the Scriptures and in loyalty to Christ and his church. She belongs to the class to whose religious constancy Paul promises a reward, those Who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life. (Rom. 2: 7.)

Army Aviator Killed

LIEUTENANT REX CHANDLER, Coast Artillery Corps, U.S.A., was instantly killed the morning of April 8, and Lieutenant Lewis H. Brereton, U.S.A., was badly hurt in the fall of a hydroplane in San Diego Bay, California. The two men started from the Army Aviation School on North Island and the spectators on the shore were horrified to see the airship plunge almost straight into the water from a height of one hundred feet. With this tragedy a toll of eight lives has been enacted by army aviation—six commissioned officers and two instructors. The list of fatalities is as follows: Lieutenant S. C. Rockwell and Corporal Frank S. Scott, killed at College Park, Md., September 28, 1912; in the same park Lieutenant Leighton N. Hazelhurst and A. L. Welsh (professional instructor) plunged to death June 12, 1912; Lieutenant G. M. Kelly, sent to his death on landing at San Antonio, Texas, May 10, 1911; Lieutenant Thomas B. Selfridge, dashed to death at Fort Myer, Va., September 1, 1908, while flying with Orville Wright, who had his leg broken in the fall; Paul Peck (professional instructor), killed in Chicago September 11, 1912. The death of Lieutenant Chandler is the two hundred and forty-fifth due to accidents to aviators and the twenty-seventh of its kind since January 1, 1913. These tragedies in the mastery of the air seem to be a part of the sacrifice, but it is a great pity to see a splendid officer of the army in full health, whose life is worth so much to his country, take such fearful risks and be thrown to his death so swiftly. Yet tragedies are a part of the game of war. Let us hope that war chariots of earth, and the sea, and the air, may soon be banished and that this prophecy may become a fulfilment:

He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire. (Ps. 46: 9.)

A WITNESS FOR THE DEFENSE

BY GRACE MACGOWAN COOKE AND EMMA BELL MILES

A Story Complete in This Issue

"MOMMY—you a-puttin' the kitty-cat right into the poke wiv the dried apples!"

Little Jo's glee was uproarious, and chubby sister giggled until her short legs gave way, and she sat down on the puncheon floor to enjoy her mirth. But the mother's set, desperate young face never changed; she thrust the kitten into her small boy's embrace, tied the bag of apples with a twist as though she wrung somebody's neck, and proceeded to set the baby girl's sun-bonnet on wrong side to. The children laughed again at that, pulling her skirts and calling her attention to the mistake she had made. When little Jo saw that she was blinded by tears he suddenly sobered. He gazed at the mysterious big bundle she was preparing to swing up on her arm, he looked around the stripped walls of the cabin and began shakily:

"What you takin' so much things to granny's for? Granny's got a many a thing in her house—an' a bigger house'n ourn."

"Hush, Jo," his mother said, but not unkindly.

Her eyes were very clear now that the tears were out of them and as innocently blue as Jo's own. Yet her mouth was hard and unsmiling. She seemed to him and sister a very ancient and efficient person, though in reality she was only a big child herself. She herded the two of them to the door, silently, got the bundle on one arm, took the baby on the other and paused a moment to look around the poor little home she was leaving—forever. Somehow the joyousness of going to granny's was lost for the small boy in the strange preparations that had been made for their journey. It faded entirely as they passed through the door, the young woman walking very erect under her burdens.

Little sister trotted alongside, rather forlorn in spite of the biscuit in one chubby hand; and Jo walked soberly behind, wondering why pappy hadn't come home to breakfast, and what had happened to displease his mother. His dark-blue eyes searched her face from time to time in a puzzled way. He was clad only in a roundabout and coarse breeches that reached his ankles; but his clear face was vivid with personality.

"Ma," he asked once, "can I go over to Stamper's field and see if pappy's a-workin' thar?"

The woman shook her head without looking around. "Ef he is I ought to go and help him," added the boy. "Last day he put in thar he said he couldn't have got along without me. Why, yonder he comes now!"

Two men approached around the turn of the road. One was the constable, Jed Stamper, the other was the pappy of whom Jo had inquired so stringently, Greet Larue, a boyish-looking man, soft-eyed, with a tangle of dark curls under his hat, and an irresponsible yet apologetic air which matched the deprecating half smile that hovered on his lips.

"Pappy," shrilled the little boy, running to meet them, "air you a-wor for Mr. Stamper to-day? Must I go with you?"

The man flushed darkly. Jed Stamper's hand went out and was laid on shoulder, only to be hesitatingly withdrawn. Vesta Larue included the men in an unseeing glance and looked away.

"I'm—we're a-goin' around by Square Federick's house right now, s Larue answered in a half aside, catching at Jo's hand but looking tow his wife. "Startin' fer yer maw's?" Stamper hazarded. He came in sight of the two as they were entering the Federick yard. A good many men were standing about, half a dozen sitting on the fence; there were horses tied and groups consulting or moving to and fro. Had little Jo been older he would have known that there was a trial soon to begin in the justice's front room. As it was he inquired of a neighbor man at the gate.

"What's my pappy going in thar for?" he asked, halting in the middle of the path as a small boy does, looking up with confident friendliness. "Is they a sale?"

No one answered him. No one noticed him. The men were all deeply absorbed in the business in hand. A hog-stealing case is the event of events on Puncheon Creek. Horse-stealing, forgery, arson, may rouse other communities; but wife-murder or the slaughter of young children could not convulse Puncheon Creek as did the purloining of a porker. All its great legal battles were fought over the dend or missing body of the hog. In the heart of the wild timber country, where hogs are ear-marked and turned out to eat the mast, each man's mark must be held sacred, or the civilization of

PEACE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

WHAT though the night be darkest,
What though the storm be wild,
When a man may sit by his table
With his wife and his little child?
What though the food be costly,
And the money be scarce for more?
A heart may thrill through the winter chill
Though the wolf sits guard at the door.

For within there is warmth and lightness,
And over it all is love,
As a radiant gleam of brightness
Shines down from the God above.

What though the wars are waging,
And the fields strewn with the dead?
For the light of the lamp is glowing
On a mother's golden head.
What though the hosts are wailing,
As they ask for the sun and moon,
When a smile has place on the baby's face,
As he toys with his little spoon?

For the world at best is a sad old place,
Outside of the home's bright sphere;
Yet sorrow can have but little space,
When the Spirit of God is near!

Can it be that the seas are roaring
And the lost souls wail to the sky?
That the streets of the town are groaning
While the people give up—and die?
For the home is sweet with a blessing,
In the shadow of angels' wings;
Ah! what shall they fear? For peace is near,
With the spirit of joy it brings.

And sweet smile the lips that were weary,
And light is the laughter gay;
For how can the mind be dreary,
When the eyes watch a baby play?

Ah! what though the wind is howling
Alone in its narrow way?
In the evening time we must banish
The cares of a weary day.
And the sound of a baby's laughter
And the lilt of a mother's song
Take away the tears and the needless fears
That have haunted us all day long.

So we smile on the dear ones about us
In the beautiful haven of love;
And the storms may rage; can they rout us?
While the Master smiles from above.

did. Help the other fellow who is behind, if you can. Let them all know you are a Christian, not by talking, but by living. Get in a helpful word here and there. Get some fellow to drop his oaths. Get some fellow to drop his beer. Show Christ living in you and controlling you. Preach the Gospel among your associates by the best life you can live with God's help. I think that is the Christian work that needs to be done on a big scale. Try it, will you?" He thanked his pastor, said he had never looked at the question from that standpoint before, and went away. Six weeks later the pastor met the superintendent of the young man's department, who said: "Isn't Murray one of your men?" "Yes," was the pastor's reply; "why?" "What's come over Murray?" he said. "He's the best clerk in the whole force, and has developed into that in the month past. He's the best influence about the whole place. The men all notice it. There's a different atmosphere in his department. He's a Christian now, sure. Something has come over Murray."

That is what Christianity needs today more than costly cathedrals and eloquent sermons—more Christian employees who are not "clock-watchers," caring only to get their wages, but who show their employers that God is with them by conscientious fidelity in their work.

We need just as much to have Christian business men show their servants and customers that God is with them, not by showy benevolence only, but especially by everyday justice. In the home, also, let Christian parents show in the common duties of life that God is with them, restraining impatience and anger, promoting courtesy and unselfishness.

Whether any results are seen in others or not, ideals for which we strive strengthen us by the very striving and work out success even if the object sought is not attained. In the profound words of Browning, worthy of frequent repetition:

Aspire, break bounds, I say:
Endeavor to be good, and better still and best;
Success is naught, endeavor's all.

A second quality that made Joseph successful was his resoluteness and hopefulness in adversity. Three times, to which we have alluded, he seemed to have a right to despair. In all these cases we might fairly expect that he would say that his vision had been a delusion, that the sun of his dream had entered hopeless eclipse. But he "sets a stout heart against a steep hill." He believed that God will allow neither envy nor slander to defeat his purpose. In fact, both were made to work together for his good. His brothers' envy and greed provided free passage to Egypt, where God needed to have Joseph; and the slander of Potiphar's wife sent Joseph forward to the prison where he would meet the royal butler, through whom he would later be brought to the king. Joseph kept up a cheerful spirit when he worked without wages as a slave in Potiphar's house, and later as a prisoner unjustly accused. The cheerful fortitude with which he went right forward to his glorious goal over every obstacle finds a homely illustration in the boat called "scooter," invented by fishermen on the Great South Bay near New York City, which is now being adopted for racing contests. The scooter is simply a small sail-boat on runners adapted to glide over ice or water with equal facility and capable of readily passing from the solid to the liquid, and vice versa. It traverses a field of broken ice with ease, mounting the cakes or dropping into the intervals of water with scarcely a noticeable shock. "In like manner a well prepared life passes through the most abrupt transitions and mutations of fortune without fatal shock to faith and stability." "Ordinary men are ruled by circumstances; extraordinary men rule their circumstances." Every man who has God in his heart ought to be such an "extraordinary man."

Joseph was the first of many "prisoners of the Lord," unjustly imprisoned but undismayed, who made prisons glorious by their faith and hope and courage. On the walls of a prison in Europe in which many martyrs of religion and liberty waited their hour of execution, I read the words, cut with a nail into the wall, "Be thou faithful unto the death and I will give thee a crown of life."

Here is a story apropos of Joseph in prison, forgotten by the restored butler, whose dream he interpreted: A boy living in the most poverty-stricken section of a great city found his way into a warm Sunday school, and after some weeks became a Christian. One day, not long after, one of those skeptical grown-up people, whose hearts are dried up, tried to shake the child's faith in his new-found religion and began asking him puzzling questions. "If God really loves you, why doesn't he take better care of you? Why doesn't he tell somebody to send you a pair of shoes, or else coal enough so that you can keep warm this winter?" The little lad thought a moment, and then said, as he drew himself up straight to look at his questioner: "I dare say he does tell somebody, and somebody forgets."

Even if men forget us, we must not forget God, for success is not in achievement of external results so much as in the achievement of character. There is no more glorious roll of honor than that which records the successes of those who failed. And what a "beautiful afterward" of song and sympathy trials such as schooled Joseph for his great mission have wrought in many men and compelled them to write such sentences as: "What a friend necessity is!" "Success is not abundance of means, but of manhood." "Trifles are trifles only to triflers." "It is not so hard to receive as it is to have to receive." "Joy is distinctly moral."

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

IN REPLY TO the question, "What is the greatest fault you have seen in a Sunday school?" the following answer is given by Mrs. E. K. Warren, of Buffalo, who has been a Sunday school worker for forty-five years. She says: "One great mistake is having teachers who are not in love of Jesus and his Word. Another mistake is having teachers who do not rely on the Holy Spirit as their Teacher. Still another mistake is having teachers not called of God, that is not conscious of God's voice, saying, 'Go teach my Word.'" The best statement of the purpose of the Sunday school that we have ever seen is that it is "To bring the children to Christ, and build them up in Christ." This can be done alone through consecrated Christian teachers; no other kind is to be thought of. We have heard it suggested that to place an unconverted person in a class as teacher is the surest and surest way to make a Christian out of that person. The risk is too great; if the plan did not work, incalculable harm would be done, for the scholars would be led away from Christ rather than to him. A teacher's manner of life is apt to make a deeper impression than the words which are spoken. The teacher becomes the pattern for the scholars.

The Bible in the hands of the teacher who does not love it is every way undesirable, because the children will get the idea that it is an uninteresting, even a tedious book. On the contrary, when used by the teacher who loves it, the scholars get its true value. Every child should be taught the wonderful story of the English Bible, so full of thrilling incident.

—"TO BE CALLED OF GOD" is placing a high estimate upon the teacher's work. Most teachers are called by the superintendent, and urged very hard to take places in the Sunday school. It is well to think that God put it into the heart of the superintendent to give the invitation, and in that light, serious and conscientious attention must be given to the call. One who takes this view will think long before making some excuse for not taking up the duties of a Sunday school teacher.

Teachers relying on the Holy Spirit to be their Teacher! How grand is that attitude! But that is what God expects of us. Among the last words spoken by Jesus to his disciples, he said: "The Holy Ghost shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you" (John 14:26). Also Jesus said: "When he the Spirit of Truth is come, he will guide you into all truth" (John 16:13). Without prayer for divine direction, both in the work of preparation and teaching, we should not presume to come before our classes. Teachers who never thus pray will be but blind guides (Luke 6:39).

Puncheon Creek is in vain. Little Jo paused to listen to a youth who had walked all the way from Sequatchie Valley for the trial.

"Reckon we'll hear some tall talkin'," this young man opined as he whittled industriously at the log upon which he sat.

"Naw, ye won't," rejoined an older man, plainly his father. "They've got that thar town-taught lawyer boy, with the little sense and the big sentences, to prosecute; but that's as fer as hit'll go. Larue ain't got no money to borry him a lawyer. They tell me he ain't got nobody to speak f r him."

Little Jo listened to that very earnestly. Nobody to speak for his father? Well, if they'd let him, and it was anything he could say, Jo felt rising within him a big ability to utter whatever was necessary for that beloved one. He pattered on a few indecisive steps toward the porch where there were more men.

"Hit's a plain case," Billy Epperson was explaining to a newcomer. "Big Jake Renfro turned the hawg out one morning. Next day Larue sold a dressed hawg at Vaughan's store down in the valley. The years ev'n was lef' on. Big Jake identified his mark, a swaller-fork in the right an' a underbit in the left."

Jo was interested in this talk about the hog for a reason. He had thought to take a hand in the conversation when his attention was attracted by a spurred, slouch-hatted cattle man who tied his horse outside the yard and joined the men on the porch.

"Reckon they'll about send him up to Brushy Mountain," this individual remarked.

Jo was too small a child to know anything of the convict mines at Brushy Mountain, but somehow the name sounded ominous.

"Quare time o' year to steal a hawg," the cattle man went on. "Ever'body out a-ridin' after their stock to round hit up and drive it down to the valley—I know I am. He might a-knowed he'd be ketched. D'ye reckon they can prove it on 'im?"

"Ye-ah," growled Big Jake Renfro, elbowing his way through the door. "I kin prove it. He sure got my hawg."

"Howdy, Mr. Renfro," piped little Jo politely. He had, stowed away in his childish mind, a reason for being extra polite to Big Jake; he was glad the big man had appeared because both of them might be needed to speak for pappy. But his greeting went unnoticed; instead, Renfro bellowed on about his wrongs. He had one of those immense and unmanageable basses that give the effect of running away with the possessor and hurrying him into extravagance of expression and intonation.

"Hit was a powerful big barrer," the great voice boomed. "I'd been a-feedin hit corn for six weeks—hit an' two gelts that run together; I'd 'em e'en-about ready to butcher. I reckoned they'd, ary one, run two hundred. The man down at Vaughan's store told me they paid Larue for nigh on to two hundred weight."

Again little Jo attempted to speak. They were getting on to a subject that would comfortably introduce his thanks to Big Jake Renfro; but Stamper, the constable, emerging from the group, paused a moment to say, "Just that thar fac' of the hawg bein' fat ort to be evidence enough to convict on. Larue never was knowed to raise enough to fatten a shoat. Ain't a field of corn land in the bottom big enough to raise what'd fatten one of the breed that he raises. Tell ye what's a fac', ye might take an' feed one of them razorbacks he's got a carload o' corn, an' the feed 'd all run to laigs and bristle. Ye cain't see 'em when they're a-coming or a-going, ye got to get 'em broadside to know they're thar."

Jo resented the laugh that followed this. He couldn't have told you why. He was used to the rough joking of the men, and a great favorite among them. At the moment his fair little face swam into Big Jake Renfro's ken, but the tall man only turned aside in an embarrassed fashion, muttering disgustedly to a neighbor.

"Thar's Larue's boy Jo. Looks like the feller might of kep' his kid away from the trial. Ort to be at home today if ever he was."

Stamper crossed the porch and went in.

"Gettin' along towards time, ain't it?" suggested the man from Sequatchie as he came up the path, followed by his boy. Those from the yard were crowding into the porch now. The child stood alone in the middle of the gravel path, as he had stood alone in the dusty road.

"Is that his kid?" asked the Sequatchian in a lowered tone.

They were all turning to look. The little boy stood so straight that the noonday sun above his bare head scarcely cast a shadow on the small bare feet.

"Quare," mused Big Jake Renfro, "what good chillen some ornery folks does have. Reckon that's how the world gits ahead any. If the children was as triflin' as their dads—Land! That thar Jo he packs mighty nigh all the wood his mommy cooks and washes with. The school teacher told me he was the smartest young 'un of his age in the district."

Jo heard none of this; the justice, Harmon Federick, appeared in the door and beckoned in the lingerers.

"All right, boys, I'm ready now," he said with a deep-voiced deliberation that was not quite a drawl. He was an iron-gray man with a kindly wide mouth and steady eyes. He had the weather-beaten look of the other countrymen; but they answered his greeting with a special respect and filed rapidly into the big, square, bare room.

Jo tiptoed from side to side in the crowd, trying to see between the tall figures that rested heavily on their trouser pockets all about him, and drawing gradually nearer to the front. He noted that the attention of the room was focused on his father. Pappy was evidently to be of some importance in the proceedings—a most satisfactory state of affairs, he thought, till Larue turned his haggard face. Then Jo caught his breath and glanced up quickly at the men around him. Their eyes were somehow inimical, accusing. Pappy was in trouble, then—and these men were against him! Without a moment's hesitation the boy wriggled through the crowd, trotted across an open space, and took his stand at his father's side.

The case was called. The prosecuting attorney was there to represent the State; the justice's part was merely to hear the evidence and decide whether or not the accused should be held for trial in the circuit court.

The witnesses against Larue—Big Jake, several neighbors, the purchaser from the valley store—were asked to rise and be sworn. Larue sat by a little table near the justice, his whole lithe body sagging forward on his elbows, his chin in one hand, his shamed eyes on the floor. He had no lawyer, no witnesses. He was like a wild thing that has been trapped and feels the intolerable humiliation of constraining hands. The child nestled against him, sometimes rubbing his head along the man's shoulder with a cublike caress, or lifting his round little face to look all about the room with dark blue, wide-open eyes.

The attorney rose and outlined the story of the theft as it would be proved. His clothes were impressive, his verbiage magnificent. He spoke of the positive evidence concerning the ownership of the hog. He had completed but a few sentences when he noticed he did not have the attention lemnly swear—that I will speak the truth—the whole truth and nothing but the truth, so help me God."

"Now you're a witness, Jo," said the squire. "Set in this chair; and remember, you've sworn to tell the truth."

The young lawyer started to ask a question, but the justice, who had children of his own, raised his hand. "Let him tell it in his own way, Colby," he commanded. "Now, then, Joey"—he smiled gravely into the blue eyes, and every man in the room craned forward silently to see and hear—"tell us what you know about it."

"Pappy didn't steal ary hawg; why, you know he wouldn't. He traded for it," repeated the confident, childish voice. At the justice's grave nod he gathered himself together, forgetting the crowded room and the lawyer who had abused his father, set in to tell all he knew as to Big Jake Renfro's "powerful big barrer" which had been sold dressed at Vaughan's store by Greet Larue. With a child's unspoiled wisdom, he began at the real beginning of what he had to tell.

"Why, I wanted powerful bad to go to school. Last year I didn't get to go a-tall, 'caze the crop we put in yon side the ridge—why—pappy he had a interruption with Mr. Renfro an' we had to move away an' leave it jest when it was all a-sprouted good. So I couldn't go to school, 'caze pappy, he couldn't get me no books nor clothes a-tall. Nen he 'lowed he'd get me my books this year, an' I'd study awful hard an' ketch up with the other boys mighty quick. Mommy she said, 'What's the use?' But pappy 'lowed he'd get 'em."

There was a little stir in the room over by the door and some few heads were turned as a woman with a bundle on her back, a baby in her arms, and a little child clinging to her skirt, mounted the porch steps.

"Pappy an' me talked about it a heap o' times when mommy wasn't around; 'caze mommy she used to get sorter pestered."

The woman on the porch set her bundle down suddenly and pushed her way through the door.

"Nen the dry weather come an' burned up all our corn an' truck," Jo went earnestly on, " and mommy says, 'Now for sure ye cain't go to no school, Jo—an' didn't I tell ye so? Now ye see what yer pappy does fer ye.' An' I cried. But pappy he went through the door quick an' called me outside the house where was all dark, an' whispered so nobody couldn't hear but him an' me, an' he says he knows how to get me books an' shoes—an' he'll get 'em sure—and I neenta cry."

Again that little stir by the doorway and the parting of the crowd this time to let a woman's white face and level glance through to the little speaker.

"An' school was goin' to take up awful quick." Little Jo forsook the chair in which the justice had placed him, and going to his father's side laid hold of a sagging arm. "I thought sure pappy couldn't make it—but he did—he did! He went an' traded Mr. Renfro two of our ol' mean hawgs for one of his good 'uns, 'caze you know ourn is the kind that won't get fat and his'n always does, so you can sell 'em."

A breath as of a sigh went across the tense listeners. So this was it—the poor little sordid tragedy, with after all a touch of God's sweetness in the human love wrapped up in it.

"Yes he did—didn't you, pappy?" little Jo asserted in a voice which only trembled from earnestness, shaking his father's arm. "Tell 'em, pappy—you tell 'em now."

Larue merely nodded, then jerked away, flung out an elbow and hid his face against it on the table. His bowed shoulders shuddered and many an onlooker swallowed nervously.

Jo waited a moment, then despairing of his father's word, he made an end.

"He drove that thar hawg o' Mr. Renfro's home late of an evenin', an' I he'ped him kill an' clean next mornin' befo' day so's he could get a good early start to the valley with it. I he'ped him 'caze 'twas to buy my books an' shoes—an' mommy never knowed nothing 'bout it, 'caze I promised cross my heart I wouldn't tell her nor nobody. But I can tell now, cain't I, pappy?—'caze Square said so."

He stopped, suddenly and awfully aware of his father's bent head and heaving shoulders, of the look upon the men's faces, of his mother watching him from the doorway, hushing the baby on her arm, and the tired, wondering little sister whimpering against her skirts. Suppose he had done wrong in speaking!

"He got you the books, did he, son?"

The quiet gravity of Squire Federick's voice relaxed the tension. It must be all right. The child's eyes lighted; all his teeth, like grains of rice, flashed into view; he wriggled happily in remembrance.

"Uh-huh—got me a reader, an' a 'rithmetic, an' a pencil an' tablet—an' a new pair o' shoes. I put 'em on and walked down the road a piece to see what my new tracks looked like." He confided this to the justice alone, and more shyly. "Hit was all right for me to tell you all 'bout hit, wasn't it, Square?"

"It was right," said the squire.

"Jo!" called his mother from the doorway.

But the boy did not hear. Squire said he had done right, and yet his father sat with bowed head and all the men seemed against him. Jo patted the ragged sleeve comfortingly. He looked to the justice for help. There was a silence for a full minute. Federick seemed to be sorting words in his mind. He in his turn stared hard at the prosecutor. At last Big Jake Renfro got up, cleared his throat, and finally found voice.

"Harmon," he forgot he was in court, speaking to a justice, "I reckon I ain't got any charge ag'in Larue. Looks to me like I'll stand by that trade little Jo names to us—what say?"

The young attorney leaped to his feet.

"Such a proceeding would be quite irregular," he began.

"Keep your seat, Colby," Squire Federick ordered briefly. "If Renfro takes it that way this case is dismissed. Court's adjourned. Excuse me, gentlemen, I've got a word to say to my neighbor Larue."

The squire came ponderously around from behind his desk while the onlookers took the hint and began pouring from the court room; the cattleman being heard to express a pious hope that he might be blessed.

The room was almost cleared, Colby stopping to get some papers together, Big Jake Renfro lingering uncertainly, and Vesta Larue still standing with the baby on her hip, the bundle set down beside her, bending slightly and looking uncertainly from her man to the others. Jo saw her now for the first time and ran to her. She silenced his voluble explanations with a swift hand laid upon his cheek, pressing his little face against her skirts.

"Yes—yes—I heard, Joey. Mother isn't mad. Hush, honey."

"Hit ain't no use, Square." Larue was speaking in a muffled tone to the justice who had dropped a friendly hand on his shoulder. "My wife found out about it and she—she's done left me. I ain't much good at the best of times, but without my folks—my Vesta—you might as well shoot me. I wisht you'd a convicted me an' sent me to the mines."

"Your wife's here, Larue," the justice bent down to say in a low tone.

WHEN WE GO A-CALLING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

IT SEEMS such a little, insignificant thing, this making of calls; but it is a much weightier matter than many people think. Not merely a business of putting on one's best dress and going out in a martyr-like frame of mind to bore some one else. There are many vital little things that must be observed in calling.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

Shall I tell you some of them? First of all, there is a list of things that must be remembered when one is calling; the "correct" things to do.

If the call is formal, one must always go armed with a card, her little white pass to the society of her friends. If a maid comes to the door the card is given to her, but if a member of the family comes, the name is given verbally. When leaving, the card is placed on some nearby stand or table. A card should be left for each person upon whom you are calling.

A hostess is considered rude if she keep her guests waiting for a long time while she fusses over her dress. They had much rather see her instead.

These are the most strict of the iron-bound restrictions for those who call. There are other rules that are more voluntary, that come more or less from the kindness of the heart.

I KNOW of a lady who is a semi-invalid. She has many friends who love her and who consequently call upon her. But, she told me one day, although she loves her friends and enjoys their visits, they tire her very much.

"They forget, my dear," she said, "that I am not strong. They stay on and on until my head spins and my eyes feel as if they are burning me. They talk of things that interest me, and yet after a while that, too, tires me. I cannot follow their conversation or act as if interested; I can only remember how weary I am and wish that they would go home."

The callers in this case were well meaning, kind friends. They had no intention of doing wrong, but they were certainly very thoughtless.

Then there is another kind of a caller that everybody dislikes; the woman, filled up to the eyes and overflowing with gossip, who will go to call on a nervous friend. She will talk until her hostess is almost frantic, and then, with many warnings, she departs to pounce upon another victim.

Who has not been at some time the unlucky recipient of a call made by the kind of woman who fusses and fidgets during her whole stay, who folds and unfolds her hands, picks at her gloves, and taps on the floor with her feet? When she has been seated for a few minutes, she begins to say

"I must go home now," or

"I don't want to tire you," or even

"My, how late it is!" until, after much confusion, she has finally dragged her hostess to the door. Then while the unwilling lady is standing shivering in the icy air, she complacently chats until the whole house is chilled through, and her poor friend has taken cold.

THERE are many kinds of calls and one is as different from the others as the summer is from the winter. There is the condolence call, when one should be cheerful as well as tender and loving; there is the "first call" to welcome a new neighbor; and there is the "I've-got-to-do it" call. The last is very awful, for the caller usually goes prepared to be bored to death and she is rarely disappointed. When one expects to have a horrid time one usually does.

The "first call" has to be very hospitable and friendly. The object of such a call is to welcome a newcomer into the social life of the place. Naturally, she gets her impressions from your attitude. Such a call should be returned in about ten days.

But the condolence call is a very delicate matter. One must avoid unpleasant subjects and gloomy predictions; and one must be sympathetic with a very subtle sympathy.

There are many people who make their calls at inconvenient times. Some carelessly informal people rush in anywhere from nine o'clock in the morning until three in the afternoon; while others never appear until seven or eight o'clock and stay on, while a hungry family impatiently clamors for dinner. Now, the best calling time is between four and six in the afternoon. That time fits in nicely between the hurry of the housework and the calm of the evening.

I DO not know just how early the call had its origin, but I can imagine that in the early part of the rough stone age, the ferocious, cannibalistic ladies hitched up their prehistoric monsters to the family chariot and went out to see their friends. Long before the time of the Cæsars, calling was quite a feature of Roman society. The Bible tells us that Jesus went to see his dear ones. Can you imagine the love that came with him and the joy with which he was greeted?

If we could only put a little of the spirit of love into our calls, they would be better and more satisfying things, not only for ourselves but for our hostess.

When you go out to make a call,
  Don't fuss about your hat;
Don't let your thoughts dwell on your gloves,
  Or anything like that!

But oh! be sure that in your soul
  Some kindness has its place;
Let happiness be in your mind,
  A smile upon your face.

For in this world much sorrow
  And trouble have their sway;
See if you cannot banish them
  A little while to-day.

Make other hearts in time with yours,
  Comfort the tears that fall;
Oh, dear, remember just these things,
  When you go out to call!

Modern ideas in building construction find their best, their most artistic, their most economical expression in—

Utility Wall Board

It is the ideal wall for the interior of the home, office, store, garage, or other building.

It takes the place of lath and plaster and is cheaper than the old-fashioned lath and plaster wall.

It does away entirely with the muss attendant on wall building and once up, set by either novice or expert, you are done forever with cracked walls, falling plaster, unsightly stains, etc.

It will not warp, crack, nor shrink and is sound and moisture proof; fire resisting and as durable as the building itself.

Utility Wall Board is extensively used in reconstructing the old home as well as in building the new. May be put on over old and cracked plaster if desired.

It may be decorated in any way you would treat a plaster wall.

THE CROCUS

THESE hardy little pioneers are fearless of the cold,
And spring the first of all the flowers above the frozen mold;
And in the chilly winds of March their dainty censers swing
Beside the drifts of melting snow, to give a hint of spring.

Low in the tangled grasses, faded and dead and sere,
They come with joyful message, the sodden earth to cheer;
Attired in purple vestments and breastplates of pale gold
To clasp the silvery furze they wear to shield them from the cold.

They are the swift forerunners of Flora's welcome train,
Who will strew with bloom and verdure the valley and the plain.
Although she is belated and the time is overdue,
She sends the little crocus to keep her promise true.

Clarion, Iowa. MRS. W. F. GIBBS.

INSOMNIA

THE weary, lingering moments fade and die,
The lengthening hours in slow procession creep;
The phantom slumber coldly passes by,
"Tired nature's sweet restorer, gentle sleep."

But oh, my heavenly Father, when
I'm laid in death's dark chamber deep,
I trust to share thy promise then;
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

The squire squinted one eye thoughtfully. "Why—you're a-goin' to rent him that piece of creek bottom you fell out with him about last year," he said decidedly. "The man can make a living off tha'."

There was a moment of silence out of respect to little Jo's presence; then the child saw, down in the yard, a dog he knew and ran to greet it.

"Um," grunted Renfro reflectively. "Well, looks like such a chap as little Jo might make a man of his daddy yit."

The squire moved aside from the doorway to let Larue and his wife through. The man had slung the big bundle on his shoulder and was shifting the sleepy baby to his left arm as he came out.

"Whar we goin' now, mommy?" the boy cried, running up to his parents.

"Home."

The mother answered in one word; but that one word meant all to those who heard it.

sumingly to his heart." Think of se instances and many others that cult to know what is the matter a good many of us. When we e to look out on a dying world, ewhat as Jesus looked upon it

ed the cross, despising the shame;
then, and not till then, will we be able to accomplish large things for him. Oh, away with this deadness in regard to eternal realities! Away with this spirit of selfishness and materialism that abounds throughout the land! Away with our ease and self-indulgence and craze for pleasure-seeking! Away with this subtle universalism that is saying, "Peace, peace," when there is no peace. God grant to waken up his slumbering churches until they will go forth, Christlike, throughout the world, winning the nations from the darkness of sin, out to the light of his truth and freedom of his blessed Gospel.

THE KING'S JEWEL

THE other day I read a little story which seems full of meaning. Here it is, in substance:

There was an outcry at the door of the king's great hall, and a man in battered armor stumbled in and stood in front of the throne. He was breathing hard, for he was weary and angry and afraid, and the sobbing of his breath shook him from head to foot. But his anger was stronger than his weariness and his fear, so he lifted his eyes steadily to the king's face.

The king said, "Speak," but the man uttered no word. Instead, he drew from his breast a golden chain at the end of which was a jewel set with a great blue stone. Looking at it for a moment scornfully, as one who had a grievance, he threw it down on the steps of the throne and turned to go.

"Stay," said the king; "whose is this jewel?"

"An old servant of yours gave it to me and told me it came from the king," the man replied. "He said it was the blue stone of the Truth, perfect and priceless. Therefore I must keep it as the apple of mine eye and bring it back to the king perfect and unbroken. So, against open foes and secret robbers I have defended it with faithful watching and hard fighting. Through storm and peril, through darkness and sorrow, through the temptation of pleasure and the bewilderment of riches I have kept it.

"But, O king," he continued, "the jewel is not untarnished, not perfect. There is a flaw in the stone. I saw it first as I entered your palace gate. Look! It is not the crystal of Truth. I have been deceived. You have claimed my life for a fool's errand. Take the jewel."

The king looked not at the gold chain and the blue stone, but at the face of the man. Then he said gently,

"Will you give me my jewel?"

The man lifted his eyes in wonder.

"It is there," he cried, "at your feet!"

"I spake not of that," said the king, "but of your life—yourself. Have not your labors brought you strength; your perils, wisdom; your wounds, patience? Has not your task broken chains for you and lifted you out of sloth and above fear? Do you say that the stone which has done this for you is false, a thing of naught? My jewels that I seek are not dead, they are alive. But the stone that led you here—look! has it a flaw?"

He stooped and lifted the jewel. The light of his face fell upon it. And in the blue depths of the sapphire the man saw a star.

This story of the blue stone of Truth brings to our minds another precious jewel—the Pearl of great price. Many have declared that there are flaws in this stone also. They have pronounced it imperfect, of little worth. But what has it done for those who have believed in it? It has made them patient in trial, pure in temptation, valiant in danger, glad even in sorrow. They have defended it against open foes and secret robbers with faithful watching and hard fighting. Well or wounded, at home or in exile, they have often given their lives for it, deeming it of more value than all the gold of earth. Is a pearl which has done this for men a thing of naught?

Olive Schreiner, in one of her little dream-stories, tells of a hunter who went forth to capture Truth in a net. Wisdom told him that the net itself must be made of Truth, "for nothing but Truth can hold Truth." When men have truthfully and sincerely sought to learn the real worth of this pearl, they have never failed to see its beauty and value. Men must be candid and earnest in their investigations, unprejudiced, open-minded and honest. Thus only can they realize the genuineness and the beauty of the true, the perfect.

But do not Christ's followers themselves sometimes think that they see flaws in this wonderful pearl? Yes, when they forget their Redeemer. This precious jewel of salvation would be of no value without the Saviour. The man in this story had never before seen the king. A servant of the king had given him the jewel. But when the king himself stopped and lifted up the stone and the light of his face fell upon it, then in the blue depths of the sapphire the man saw no flaw—but a star.

This is perhaps the reason why so many people think they find flaws in the religion of Jesus Christ. They have never seen it in the right light. When the light which comes from his face alone shines clearly upon it, then they see no flaw, but a star! And that star will remind us of another star, which led the earnest-seeking wise men to him.

We are Christ's jewels. His children are of more value in his sight than many precious stones. Let us be wise and faithful and lead others to him. Then we shall one day shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars forever and ever.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—MOUNT MORIAH CAMP GROUND and Rest Home for the Saints, Sick and Invalid has issued a preliminary announcement of a camp-meeting to begin June 1, 1913, at Long Hill, Conn. Mrs. M. B. Woodworth Etter, of Los Angeles, Calif., will be in charge, and Mrs. Currie Judd Montgomery, of Oakland, Calif., is also announced. For further information address Dr. D. H. Dickerman, 193 Goffe Street, New Haven, Conn.

—JAMESTOWN, N. Y., has had a remarkable revival, conducted by Dr. Biederwolf, assisted by the "National Male Quartet." The Jamestown Journal said concerning the campaign: "Never since the days of the great Moody revival of more than twenty years ago has the city and vicinity been so stirred by a religious revival as in the Biederwolf services. No man who has deep in his heart the good of all the community can fail to see the wonderful work that has been accomplished here within the last five weeks."

"I AM A PRISONER, but no less a child of God, I am living to live again; because I am or was guilty of one sin, is no reason why I should continue in sin. I say I was guilty; I mean by that that God for Christ's sake has forgiven that sin, and I am no longer guilty of it, for I have long ago fully repented, not because I was in prison for that crime, but because I felt the guilt of the crime and sin and I hastened to my Saviour to cleanse me from sin and blood guiltiness. No one can ever know the terrible agony I suffered mentally and the terrible gloom that haunted me until I felt the spiritual relief." This letter is one of the cheering messages that comes to Rev. and Mrs. James Teter, of Minneola, Fla., who are engaged in work among the prisoners in that section. Mr. Teter is the State chaplain of prisons. Beside his evangelistic work he has been successful in securing large quantities of helpful reading matter for the use of the prisoners.

—A CHINA LUNCHEON was given in the Hotel Astor, New York, on March 1, at which nearly 500 women discussed plans for the evangelization of China, under the Emergency Call for China issued by the Presbyterian General Assembly. The assembly has voted to try to send 100 new missionaries to China within the next three years and to obtain special gifts in excess of the regular appropriations asked for to cover this increased expense. Among the speakers were: Mrs. Dwight Potter, Mrs. Charles K. Roys, Dr. Mary H. Fulton, Miss Emma S. Webster, Dr. George S. Webster, Mrs. DeWitt Knox and Miss Charlotte E. Hoyes.

—MISSIONARY A. R. STARK of Callao, Peru, writes that "the circulation of the Scriptures in my field in Peru, Chile, Bolivia, Ecuador, Colombia and Venezuela reached the splendid total of 82,018 copies of God's Word during 1912, principally in Spanish. South America is an expensive field, as will be seen from the fact that our expenses exceeded $20,000. We deeply appreciate the co-operation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its friends in this great work. The prayers of your readers will be warmly appreciated that the Word of God may have free course and be glorified."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

I SHOULD like to say for the Answered Prayer Department that God hears and answers my prayers every day by his loving watchfulness over me and by guiding me. I could write all day and then not be able to tell of all the prayers he has answered. But I should like to tell of one instance. Our church (Baptist) several years ago had a mortgage of $230. We were few in number and very poor and the debt was a heavy burden. We reorganized and I was elected treasurer. I at once became interested in that indebtedness and wanted to get it off our hands, but most of the members thought it was impossible to raise that amount even with outside help. The State Board had sent a good man as our pastor for a while, and he also was anxious to pay it off. At last after six months the church appointed me to raise it if I could. I began work on Friday and two weeks from the next Sunday night we burned the mortgage. I took the matter to God and told him everything. And every time I went out I first asked God to open the hearts of the people he directed me to. I did not do it; God did it, and with him all things are possible. Blessed be his name."

The above inspiring letter comes from Miss C. M. V., Greencastle, Ind. The prayer - plus - faith - plus - work method is a good one for debt-raising or any other kind of church business.

M. P. writes from Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Canada:

"I have just been reading the Answered Prayers and enjoy that department so much. It gives me new strength. Just now I am passing through the fire and am trusting in God to heal me and hope he will help me to be a better Christian than ever before."

A. F. S., of Smithburg, Md., writes: "I wish to acknowledge my heartfelt thankfulness to our heavenly Father for the restoration to health of three of my dear friends for whom I prayed constantly."

The President Addresses Congress

and children's dresses, blankets and flannels, cotton clothing, such as underwear, stockings and gloves), collars and cuffs. The bill, as presented to Congress, provides for an immediate cut of 25 per cent. in the duty on sugar, with the provision that it be placed on the free list in three years.

Altogether it is estimated that the reductions in the tariff will amount to $80,000,000 annually. It is expected that this will be made up by the proceeds of the income tax provided for in one section of the new tariff bill. It is planned to tax all incomes of more than $4,000. This covers personal revenues of all kinds, salaries or business profits. The President, the Federal judges and some other public officials are exempted from the requirements of the bill. Between $4,000 and $20,000 the tax is one per cent. of the amount by which the income exceeds $4,000; from $20,000 to $50,000, two per cent. on the amount in excess of $20,000; from $50,000 to $100,000, three per cent. on the amount exceeding $50,000; over $100,000, four per cent. on the amount exceeding that figure.

You can drink all you want of it without fear of any bad after effects, and it is good for the children.

It will help you reduce the high cost of living, as it goes twice as far as the same value of real coffee. While not a medicine, it will probably save your doctor bills by increasing the health of yourself and family.

A twenty-five cent package of "Smith's Imitation Coffee" will be mailed free to any one who will send us ten cents in stamps or coin, to help us to pay for postage and packing. Our full address is on coupon below. Please fill out the coupon and mail it today.

WHERE WASHINGTON WORSHIPED

BY ALFRED THOMAS MARKS

THREE churches in Virginia hold proud claim to close connection with George Washington, in each of which he held the position of vestryman. One of these is Christ Church, in Alexandria; another, Falls Church, in the town of the same name (about six miles southwest of Washington, in Fairfax County); the third is old Pohick Church in Mount Vernon Parish, so-called for Pohick Creek, a small stream flowing close by. The last named was the "home" church of Washington, and that to which he was most closely allied, having served as warden and vestryman in it for over twenty years, and during that time contributing generously to its support.

Of Christ Church he was a frequent attendant, as business often called him to Alexandria (which was his post office, voting and market place) for considerable periods; and especially was this true after the Revolution, when Pohick Church (which suffered severely from the misfortunes of war) was frequently closed. With Falls Church he had a somewhat slighter connection and for a shorter period, but contributed liberally to build it and acted as one of its vestrymen, as the records show.

Pohick Church is situated about three miles from the Potomac River and six miles south of Mount Vernon. In Washington's day it was the center of an extensive neighborhood, settled by wealthy planters, whose broad acres separated them widely from each other, and who, therefore, thought little of a drive of half a dozen miles, more or less, to church; for in that day the old Virginia families retained their stalwart English custom of regular attendance at public worship. An Englishman visiting one of these "barons of the Potomac" in the colonial days gives in his diary a picturesque description of attending a service at Pohick. He says: "The ladies drove to church in coaches and four, with liveried coachmen and outriders; the gentlemen went on horseback." The gay dresses and liveries and loud vociferations of the gentlemen, calling to their negro lackeys, reminded him more of a fox hunt than of a church congregation. He adds, however, that quiet and the utmost reverence were observed within the church.

Pohick Church was built in 1773, after plans made by George Washington himself, its construction being carried on under the direction of a committee of which he was chairman; and George Mason of Gunston Hall, author of the "Virginia Bill of Rights," and George William Fairfax were members. Washington also designed the interior arrangement of the church, and the plans in his own handwriting are to-day among the most cherished archives of Mount Vernon. By them we see that no space whatever was given to vestibule or robing room, such conveniences in those days evidently being considered superfluous. The high "wineglass" pulpit stood in the center of the north wall, the communion table at the east end, while opposite to it, between the two west doors, stood the substantial font of native gray granite that is to-day in use in the sacred edifice. The plan shows, also, the assignment of pews, and we note the class lines which in those colonial days marked distinction in church as well as in society. The church was evidently divided into two sections, a broad aisle from front door to pulpit marking the division between upper and lower classes. The two center front seats were allotted to George Washington and George William Fairfax, those immediately behind to Lund Washington and Alexander Henderson, respectively. Two side pews along the wall were assigned to the extensive family of George Mason; on the opposite side to Captain Daniel McCarthy and Martin Cockburn.

The church must have been handsomely equipped in its day, for the old records show that George Washington supplied the gold leaf for the interior decorations, and that he sent to England for an appropriate set of books for use in the church. The massive communion service at which George and Martha Washington knelt side by side to receive the sacrament of the church is to-day in existence and in use in the church. Rev. Lee Massey was the first rector appointed and he served long and faithfully. But quaint "Parson" Weems, so beloved of Washington, and author of that unique Life of George Washington, officiated there.

Old Pohick is as stanch and firm on its foundations to-day as the day it was erected, having withstood the storm and stress of one hundred and forty years. But the wealth and high station of the Pohick neighborhood departed many years ago, and now it is settled by a race of hardy farmers. The Daughters of the American Revolution have restored the structure to as near its original condition as possible.

Perhaps Christ Church in Alexandria is the best known of Washington's churches. This church was likewise built in 1773. Here Washington was vestryman and advisor. The square pew on the left of the main aisle occupied by George Washington and his family is exactly as it was in his day and is left undisturbed, except that visitors to the church are permitted to sit in it. The Bible on the lectern is that originally used in the church, and that in the pulpit is one used by Washington at Mount Vernon. The high pulpit is exactly the same as in Washington's day, the sounding board having been reclaimed from an old lumber room and rehung over it. The original communion table and font stand in the chancel, as do also the original chairs. The old hanging chandeliers of brass, with crystal pendants, in which wax candles only are used, have also been restored to place and use. In Christ Church all the woodwork, pews, pulpit and walls are white, with narrow bands of gold in typical colonial effect. In the churchyard was held the first public meeting of citizens of Alexandria to proclaim their adherence to the cause of independence, and Washington was chairman of and presided over the meeting. At this meeting he parted with his dear friends the Fairfaxes, allied to him so closely by ties of marriage and friendship.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Christian's Prayers*

HOW should a Christian pray? What should prayer mean to him? What place should it have in his life? What is prayer? All these are questions that we cannot study too earnestly and carefully.

The Answered Prayer column in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives week after week plain statements of facts from the experiences of honest people who declare that prayer has brought to them specific and practical blessing and bounty. Any one of these columns of letters would make inspiring reading for this devotional meeting. In preparing to lead the meeting a study of S. D. Gordon's Quiet Talks on Prayer and Prayer Changes Things would be most helpful. Andrew Murray's books on prayer, especially With Christ in the School of Prayer, are very helpful. George Müller's Life of Trust is inspiring and full of interest.

After all, Jesus himself was the greatest and best and most authoritative teacher about prayer. In the passage of Scripture assigned for this week's study (Matt. 6: 5-13) we have the heart of his directions and commands about prayer. His first demand is sincerity. Nothing is more terrible than insincere prayer. The thought of talking to God and not meaning what you say is too dreadful to contemplate. Yet many people do it. They ask God to show them his will when they are not willing to do his will. They ask him to forgive their sins when they have no deep intention of forsaking their sins. They ask him to keep them from sin when they do not really hope to be kept from it. They ask him to bring things to pass with no intention of going out and doing the thing that would help bring the answer to their prayer. All this is sad and frightful. The first step in prayer is to say exactly what you mean and to mean exactly what you say.

The next demand is humility. "Enter into thy closet." Prayer is not for show. It is the earnest, humble expression of a real, personal desire. The next demand is exclusion. "Shut thy door." Shut out other things. Much of the time when we think we are praying we are not praying at all. We are thinking of other things. We may shut the door of our closet and not shut the door of our minds. Prayer is real communion with God. He is a delightful friend to talk to. But to talk to him we must go where he is. And to get where he is we must shut out from our minds the things that separate our thought from him. As we turn resolutely away from the thoughts and concerns of life we face the light that shines from him. Then we begin to pray.

The next demand is sanity. "Do not use vain repetitions." Just tell the Father what you want in simple, straightforward language. The next demand is trustfulness. Expect to get what you ask for. "Your Father knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him." As we look at him and are conscious of his presence he will reveal to us the things we ought to ask for. The light from his face illuminates all the things from which we turned away when we sought him. They appear altogether different then. Many of the things we thought to be greatly desirable seem of little value; some things that did not seem of great importance are found to be infinitely precious. When we find out what he wants us to have, it is easy to believe we shall receive it.

Then follows the model prayer, the great, steadying, comprehensive petition of the church, "Our Father, who art in heaven."

A word should be said about still another kind of prayer, the kind that Paul referred to in his exhortation to "pray without ceasing." Constant prayer is that attitude of mind toward God in which we are always seeking to find out his will and claiming by faith his blessing and guidance. The Christian should live like this, "looking unto Jesus," getting his direction and help in the details of life, sharing our joys thankfully with him, bearing trials bravely and patiently because he is with us, doing our work for his glory, enjoying, moment by moment, the priceless gift of his friendship.

The Sympathy of Jesus*

SYMPATHY means more than mere regret at the sufferings of others. It means that the soul in some way puts itself in the place of those who are suffering and feels the grief that others feel. James speaks of a man who can say to a neighbor who lacks food and clothing: "Depart in peace; be ye warmed and filled." This is not sympathy. The man who says it might be sorry in a mild way for the plight of the unfortunate man or woman, but his sorrow means nothing to him or to them. But the friend who suffers with the destitute will not only commiserate them, but supply their need if he can. If he cannot supply it his suffering will be increased still more until it almost seems at times that he suffers as much as they, and is in despair because he cannot help them.

It was this intense, passionate kind of sympathy that Jesus had. The griefs of others were his griefs; their burdens were his burdens; their tears were his tears. He wept at the grave of Lazarus, although he knew that the grief of those who were mourning was soon to be changed to joy. It was impossible for him to observe their anguish without feeling it himself. But there were some kinds of people whom Jesus could not help; these were the people who did not acknowledge their need of him and who would not accept his blessing. He cried out above the chosen city: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets and stonest them that are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen doth gather her brood under her wings, and ye would not."

This is probably the chief message and meaning of the Incarnation. People wonder that God can allow so much sorrow in the world; they are inclined to blame him for it. The answer to all this is in the life of Jesus. There we find out that in every bit of human suffering God suffers too. The pain literally hurts him just as much as it hurts those upon whom it comes. The lonely Saviour, bearing his personal griefs of misunderstanding and failure and enmity and rejection, was "moved with compassion" at the sorrows of others. Literally were the words of the prophet fulfilled: "Surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows."

As he sympathized with those who suffered, he sympathized still more with those who sinned. He had no excuse for their sin, but their sin made him suffer. He knew that their moral diseases would bring even greater disaster than their physical ills, so he suffered with them and for them.

These studies which we are having in the life and character of Jesus carry with them a challenge and a command that we must, so far as the limitations of our human nature permit, be like him. He calls upon us to help him to bear this sad and heavy burden of the world's grief and sin, to help him remove it, to help him change the conditions that produce it.

Questions and Answers

M. E. G., Guy's Mills, Pa. 1. Those persons spoken of in the latter part of Prov. 1 represent not only the wicked of that early day, but the unrighteous of every age. They are blind in choosing destruction, so that the blame rests entirely upon themselves (Acts 13: 46). Theirs is not the unpardonable sin (which is supposed to have been attributing the work of the Holy Spirit to Satanic agencies), but the sin of infidelity and the rejection of the offer of God's grace and forgiveness. 2. The linen girdle spoken of in Jer. 13: 1 was a coarse, unwashed garment, which ultimately became foul and unfit for use. It was a type of the condition of the Jews who had become corrupted by the heathen idolatries of neighboring nations, and having ceased to be witness for Jehovah, were only fit to be cast away.

E. P. N., East Marion, L. I. Can the Bowery Mission use men's clothing? To what address should such gifts be sent?

Yes. Send to the Bowery Mission, 227 Bowery, New York.

A. G. J., Marshall, Mo. 1. The Israelites in the Exode, or at least their leaders, must have been familiar with the Egyptian laws, both civil and ecclesiastical. The famous code of Hammurabi (Babylonian), fragments of which (not the original) have been lately discovered, is believed to date about 2200 B.C., long before the Israelitish Exode. But the moral code of Israel differed from all the other earlier codes, which were framed by idol-worshiping nations. 2. Polygamy and slavery were practiced almost universally in the earlier stages of human history. No divine warrant can be alleged for either, however. (See Gen. 2: 24.) 2. In Gen. 6: 2 "the sons of God" is interpreted to refer to the descendants of Seth, who were righteous, as distinguished from the progeny of Cain, who were evil. Mixed marriages between people of opposite principles and lives were sources of widespread moral corruption in those early days and are so still. The "unequal yoke" was destructive of religion in the home and elsewhere, and the people sank to a hopeless condition of depravity.

M. C. D., Evansmills, N. J. When a will is drawn, leaving all the property to the wife, no question can arise as to title after the death of the testator. A deed of conveyance which covers all the real and personal property, prior to the man's death, is perfectly good, except for the fact that he is apt to acquire more property, either real or personal, before his death, which would not be covered by it.

A. P., Winnipeg, Canada. The physical status of nations changes. Some deteriorate, others improve. In England we understand that the standard of height and general fitness for army service has been lowered in recent years, owing to the difficulty of finding enough men to meet the old requirements. In France, too, there has been deterioration. The race as a whole has rather improved than otherwise, owing to better and more scientific modes of living, better housing and a general advancement in physiological knowledge. Large cities with their congested population form an exception to the rule.

J. W. S., Timber Ridge, Va. 1. Please explain Mark 4: 12 (last clause). 2. Was the prophecy concerning the coming of Elijah fulfilled in the coming of John the Baptist? 3. What is wilful sin?

1. See answer to A. R. D. in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for March 26. 2. Yes. John the Baptist was not a reincarnation of Elijah, but was, as we would say, "the Elijah of his times." He was to the Messiah and his times what Elijah was to Elisha and his. 3. Wilful sin is deliberate, voluntary sin. It is need of a wrong action performed when it is realized that the act is wrong and when the mind has time to deliberate.

X. Y. Z. 1. My father seems to be a Christian, but doesn't have any form of family prayer except grace at the table. I have suggested family worship, but he does not seem willing. In this case does the obligation of conducting family prayer fall upon a grown daughter? 2. As to private devotions is not prayer in the morning required as well as at night?

1. If the daughter could start the custom of conducting family worship without friction the result would surely be a great blessing to the home. In case of definite opposition it is impossible to lay down a general rule. Sometimes much blessing has resulted from a wife or other member of the family conducting family worship even when the head of the house was strongly opposed to it. In other cases it has been better to wait till his consent could be secured. Ordinarily the last way is better, particularly when the husband and father is a professing Christian. By gentleness, humility, patience, and by much secret prayer he can probably be won to give his consent. If the daughter takes up this burden modestly and earnestly he may be led to a deeper consecration which will make him willing to fulfil his plain duty in this regard. Certainly every Christian father should conduct family worship in his home. 2. Private prayer in the morning is surely a natural and desirable item of the religious life. Whether it is as necessary as prayer at night would perhaps be difficult to declare positively. At night one wishes to review the events of the day and make sure that one's record is clear and one's heart right before going to sleep. If this is done it is perhaps natural to feel that it is not necessary to spend so much time at prayer in the morning, particularly under the rush and strain of modern life. Some time, however, should certainly be spent in the morning, enough, at least, to bring the soul to an attitude of calm and vigorous trustfulness for the day's work. The "Morning Watch" is a splendid movement, bringing thousands of people into the habit of unhurried morning Bible study and prayer.

Reader, N. Y., and Mrs. M. M. S., Enterprise, Kan. The tithe was of the increase of one's possessions. There are many good people who still hold that a tenth of one's income should be set aside for the Lord's work. Under the ancient Jewish economy, tithing was regulated by a code of laws which were amplified and made still more complex by the rabbins; but under Christianity, the supreme law of love has been substituted and is applicable to the tithing problem quite as well as to others. We are to give according as God has "prospered us," and from a generous and loving heart. One who wishes to tithe his estate should reckon on the increase in value, or number, or whatever form his available asse may assume, excluding of course the necessa expenses of conducting his business. As t household expenses, these are elastic, and one domestic and personal expenditures are liab to increase with every augmentation of i come, such increase frequently being one extravagance rather than of necessity. It i quite conceivable that the whole income migh be thus swallowed up. When Jesus stood b the treasury, he called attention to the fac that while the rich had cast in gifts of thei superfluity, the poor widow had done bette than they, for she had cast in "all her living as a love offering, and it was an acceptabl one. If we are to lavish all our prosperity o ourselves and our families, leaving nothing f the Lord's work, may we not be "robbin God"? Practically all of the difficulties in volved in the problem would be solved if w followed the method of many Christians, wh have been rich both in prosperity and goo works. They gave freely from the increase o their wealth which remained after absolutel necessary business expenses were covered, mak ing the Lord a partner in all that remained They did not ask themselves how much the need give to meet the requirements, but rathe how fully and generously and gratefully the could show their love in making their gift fo Jesus' sake. An offering we do not feel, an which is simply of our surplus, is a gift o comparatively little worth, no matter hov large the sum, while one that involves se denial and even sacrifice, given with a cheerfu heart, is rewarded with blessing.

W. E. D., Morristown, Ohio. 1. The mos ancient tablets of inscribed brick yet found ar believed to be of the date of 3800 B.C. Pro fessor Hilprecht describes them. He also name Sargon I. as one of the earliest Babylonia rulers whose identity was revealed through these tablets. Naram-Sin belonged to the same period (about 3750 B.C.). His name is stil preserved on a broken column in old Baby lonian cuneiform characters, as the "beloved of the Moon God," who caused the monument to which the fragment belongs to be erected upon a terrace near the present town of Diarbekir on the upper Tigris. 2. The age of the pyramids is believed to be somewhat over 4,000 years. In the great pyramid of Gizeh, the name of the founder, Shufu, has been detected by archeologists, written in hieroglyph. The second pyramid is believed to have been built by Chephren, about 2186-2163 B.C., and the third by Mencheres about the same date. 3. We have never heard that archeologists succeeded in deciphering Hittite writings. Dr Ward, a very good authority, believes the Hittites were Mongolians, speaking a Turanian tongue. Their language is the great puzzle now before Oriental scholars.

SMYRNA, THE CITY OF THE NOBLE CROWN

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

A TYPICAL STREET SCENE IN SMYRNA

IT IS an interesting fact, and perhaps not altogether without genuine spiritual significance, that Smyrna, the only city of the seven except Philadelphia whose church receives from the Master unqualified praise, is also the only city of the seven which is to-day great and prosperous. Next to Constantinople it is the largest and most important city of the Turkish Empire. Its situation, too, is almost as fine as the peerless site of the city on the Bosphorus.

Seated majestically on rising ground on the southeast shore of the Gulf of Smyrna, it seems as one looks from its wharves as though built on the banks of a great inland lake. A large island blocks the view as one gazes out to the Ægean; and yet the entrance is so deep and safe, and the harbor itself so spacious, that, according to the hackneyed saying, the navies of the world can ride at the water front of Smyrna. To be sure, the city has no mighty Olympus to keep guard over it as has Salonica. It has no narrow thoroughfare through which constantly ply the vessels of many nations as has Constantinople. But it has glories all its own. Splendid mountains surround it on almost every side. Mount Pagus, the old citadel of Smyrna, up whose steep side many of the houses of modern Smyrna are climbing, is like a great fist, as some one has expressed it, thrust out by the hills behind the city, and connected with the mountain ranges to the south—a fist which in the early days, when crowned with a mighty fortress and manned by tens of thousands of soldiers, seemed to be shaken threateningly in the face of every invader. I have approached Smyrna both from the sea and from the land, and whether one journeys across the Ægean from Athens after an eighteen-hour voyage, or comes overland from Constantinople by rail, a long two days' journey, he is impressed not only with the picturesqueness of the situation, but also by the seeming vigor and vitality of the city. Though Smyrna claims to be at least 3,500 years old, and her recorded history goes back for nearly three thousand years, she is as alert, enterprising and busy as though she had had her birth in the last century on one of our own great lakes, instead of on the shores of the oldest sea of the civilized world. Let us in imaginaton go ashore from one of the great black steamers of the Messageries Maritimes. We land on a noisy, bustling quay alongside of which runs a little one-horse railway. Great ships from most of the leading ports of the world are tied up to the quay by their sterns. On the other side of the broad street, the only one in Smyrna to which this adjective can be applied, are large warehouses and one or two pretentious hotels. Passing through a cross street we come to the great business artery of the city, the so-called "Frank Street," which has doubtless obtained its name from the fact that so many Franks, a generic name for foreigners, do business on it. This street is only fifteen feet wide, and yet it is the chief business thoroughfare of a city of a quarter of a million inhabitants. Two people stretching out their arms and touching hands in the middle could span the street, and yet through it hurries a constant stream of foot passengers, dashing cabs, stately camels, donkeys and donkey-boys, beasts of burden and men of burden, carrying every conceivable article that people of the Orient or the Occident might want; for this is one of the chief cities in the world where East and West meet on a common footing.

THE CARAVAN BRIDGE AT SMYRNA

At its upper end Frank Street debouches into one of the ever-fascinating Oriental bazaars. A celebrated English author speaks of these bazaars as a "network of narrow, ill-paved, dirty lanes, forming the great business center of Smyrna. Everything is sold in these dismal quarters," he says, "and they doubtless give a faithful picture, in the unchanging East, of the Smyrna of the days of the apostles." There is no doubt that these bazaars are "narrow, ill-paved, and dirty," but they cannot be said to be "dismal," for there is no mart of trade in all the world that has more kaleidoscopic changes, more brilliant colors, or, to the stranger, more interesting people than the bazaars of Smyrna. Here every trade is being carried on under your very eye; all the goods, so to speak, are in the shop windows. Not that there are any shop windows, or windows of any other kind, in these bazaars, which are lighted from the open ends, and from apertures in the roof; but every merchant has brought all his goods to the front, and usually sits cross-legged behind them, waiting for a customer, while he sips his thick coffee and reads the paper or the Koran. Some of the bazaar merchants of Smyrna, however, are more enterprising than their brethren in other cities, and send out touts and barkers to induce you to patronize their shops, especially those who deal in curios, to tempt the unsophisticated foreigner; ancient armor, antiquated daggers and weapons, all of which very likely were made day before yesterday. It is hard to shake off these persistent salesmen who plead with you a thousand times over to "come visit my shop! very fine antikkers! you no need buy anything! you just look!" If, however, one is beguiled to go and look he will find it exceedingly difficult to get away from the wily, persistent merchant without buying some trinkets, for which he will afterward find but little use. Jewelers and money-changers, rug dealers and saddlers, spice merchants and sellers of figs and dates and oranges and grains, shoe stores and fez shops, hardware and dry-goods stores are all mixed up in endless confusion, or at least appear so to the newcomer. At one end of the bazaar we hear a tremendous din, as though we were approaching a dozen boiler shops, but find that we are only drawing near to the copper bazaar, where the workmen are laboriously pounding out bowls and platters, waterpots and saucepans, and dishes of all shapes and sizes. Through these bazaars drivers with two-horse phaetons, camels, horses and donkeys are constantly passing, and the unlucky foot passenger must flatten himself against the wall to avoid being crushed either by a carriage or a loaded camel. All sorts of vehicles and four-footed creatures, as well as human bipeds, are straggling or rushing through the shops instead of through the streets, which would seem to be the proper channels of traffic.

Not far from the bazaars is Fishmarket Street, another interesting though somewhat unsavory and ill-smelling thoroughfare. Here fine mackerel, sole and cod have to compete for popularity with the humble squid, the hideous devilfish, the octopus and the inky cuttlefish. The streets are all narrow and tortuous and there are fewer fine buildings, mosques and churches than either in Salonica or Constantinople. Architecturally Smyrna must have degenerated since the ancient days, for we are told that then the streets were broad and handsome, well paved and running at right angles with each other. There were a number of squares and porticoes and public libraries, a museum, a stadium in which Olympic games were celebrated with great enthusiasm, a grand music hall or Odeon, a Homerion and many temples, of which the most famous was that of the Olympian Jupiter, in which the reigning emperor was practically the god worshiped. The ancient Smyrniotes were inordinately proud of their city; they called it the "First of Asia," though the Ephesians violently disputed this claim. The inhabitants also called their city the "City of Homer," who they claimed had been born and brought up beside their sacred river Meles. They put his image upon a coin, which they called a Homerion, a name given to one of their temples. Enormous fragments yet remain showing what tremendous buildings once occupied the broad plateau on the summit of the acropolis, and as one rebuilds in imagination these wonderful piles he can easily forgive the Smyrniotes of old for their grandiloquent praise of their city and its beautiful crown.

On one side of this crowned hill (Mount Pagus) is the most interesting spot for the Christian pilgrim to-day, the tomb of the martyr Polycarp, who in the middle of the second century was here burned at the stake. He was the bishop of Smyrna, and a disciple of St. John himself. Irenæus, who was bishop of Lyons at the close of the second century, was the pupil of Polycarp, and writes about him most lovingly and touchingly. Thus we have unbroken links in a chain of testimony extending through two centuries which take us back to Christ himself. Irenæus the disciple of Polycarp, Polycarp the disciple of St. John, St. John the disciple of Christ. Who does not cherish the beautiful saying of the aged bishop when on the stadium of Smyrna at two o'clock of a Saturday afternoon in the year 156, as the flames mounted around him, and he was asked to save his life by renouncing Christ, he cried out, "Eighty and six years have I served him, and he has done me no ill; how then can I blaspheme my King who hath saved me?" Bunyan fittingly designates this noble martyr in one of his own inimitable phrases as the one "that played the man in the fire."

The traditional spot of his martyrdom is now guarded by a great cypress tree, and under this is a green-painted Mohammedan tomb, with a marble fez, the Moslem embellishment of a grave, on top. And this is said to be Polycarp's tomb! It seems strange and sad that even his traditional resting-place should be in a Turkish cemetery and in a Turkish sepulcher, for he belongs pre-eminently to the Christian Church, though the Moslems regard him as a famous saint. "Polycarpa tomba! Polycarpa tomba!" cried a little black girl as we approached the tomb. These were her two English words, though she was abundantly familiar with the word "bakshish," and followed us half a mile from the tomb, begging for a few more paras. Some forty years before he died Polycarp wrote an epistle to the Philippians in which he quotes profusely from the apostolic writings, showing that they were well known in the Christian Church only a few years after the death of St. John the Divine.

Ephesus was called "the passageway of the martyrs," because through Ephesus most of them passed on their way to die at Rome. But Smyrna also was a highway of the martyrs, and through this city the great Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, passed to his glorious death at Rome. Here he was met and comforted by the Christians of Smyrna, and in writing back to Polycarp he says, "I give exceeding glory that it hath been vouchsafed me to see thy blameless face."

We have been describing modern Smyrna and old Smyrna, but there was an older Smyrna still; for the most ancient city was said to have been founded by Tantalus, some 3,500 years before Christ, at the extreme end of the bay, about four miles from the modern city, which was also the city of Polycarp and St. John. As we climbed the rough and rugged hill of the oldest Smyrna of all, leaping from boulder to boulder, dodging the prickly shrubs where the hardy goats alone can find any sustenance, we felt that indeed we were getting back to ancient days, as we gazed at the so-called tomb of Tantalus and the Cyclopean wall which surrounds it, which antedates the records of historic time. It is of special interest to Protestant Christians to know that there are not only Greek and Armenian Protestant churches in Smyrna to-day, but a flourishing international college started, supported and manned by American Christians.

Two characteristics of Smyrna, it has been pointed out by eminent authorities, are alluded to in the beautiful commendatory words of St. John. A thousand years before Christ Smyrna was a great Grecian city, but it was conquered and destroyed, wiped off the face of the map, indeed, by the Lydian king Alyattes about 600 years before Christ. Smyrna was dead and yet it lived; for though the city was destroyed, there were many villages round about the ancient city that constituted a state named Smyrna. The One who sends the message to Smyrna through John is spoken of as the One "who was dead and is alive," alluding of course to our Lord's death and resurrection, and perhaps with a secondary allusion to the city which for hundreds of years was dead and then lived again; for the writer in a wonderful way makes every part of the message, even the inscription, appropriate to the history and the situation of the lovely city to which he writes.

Not a word of censure or a suggestion of blame is found in this message. This absence of reproof it shares alone with the message to the church at Philadelphia. But it was not a rich church in the usual sense of the words. The Revelator knew its poverty and its tribulations as well as its good works. And here is inserted that significant and beautiful parenthesis, "but thou art rich"—rich in good works, rich in heavenly treasure, rich in the truest kinds of wealth.

Then the writer predicts the sufferings which would surely come to this noble church. "The devil shall cast some of you into prison that ye may be tried, and ye shall have tribulation ten days." Ten days is a limited period of time which will come to an end. The tribulation is not hopeless and measureless. Even if death comes it matters little, as was proved in the case of Polycarp and many another martyr in the awful persecutions of those terrible years of suffering.

Then comes the glorious reward. "Be thou faithful even unto death"—faithful as Smyrna had been to the Roman power, with which she had early thrown in her lot and been known as "the faithful city" during all the vicissitudes and the many changes of Roman rule. So be thou faithful to thy religion and thy Master, says the Revelator, "and I will give thee the crown of life"—a nobler crown than that which surmounted the citadel of Mount Pagus; a nobler crown than the splendid fortresses and buildings to which every citizen of Smyrna looked up with admiration and pride; a nobler crown even than Apollonius described when he told the people it was "a greater charm to wear a crown of men than a crown of porticoes"; even the crown of life, which should be given to the faithful church by Him who was the First and the Last, who was dead and yet lived again.

This too is a message that every Christian may well take to heart. The poor, those who have much tribulation and suffering, those who are ostracized, as were the Christians of Smyrna, by the Jews who belonged to the "synagogue of Satan," all these sons and daughters of men, yea, all true Christians, may well take to heart: "Be thou faithful even unto death, and I will give thee the crown of life. He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death."

The passage on which Dr. Clark bases this article is found in Rev. 2: 8-11.

THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE "TITANIC" TRAGEDY

AT ABOUT 2.30 A.M. on April 15, 1912, the White Star liner Titanic foundered off the Banks of Newfoundland, after striking an iceberg. She was the largest and finest vessel afloat, believed to be "unsinkable," and her general equipment was regarded as all but incapable of improvement. Of the 2,340 persons on board—officers, passengers and crew—1,635 went down with the ship or died from exposure as they were kept afloat in the icy sea by lifebelts. Among the more conspicuous of those who perished were Colonel J. J. Astor, Major Archibald Butt, Mr. and Mrs. Isidor Straus, W. T. Stead, Benjamin Guggenheim, Jacques Futrelle and S. Ward Stanton. The death list would have been greatly increased but for the prompt action of Captain Rostron of the Cunard steamship Carpathia, who turned back from his course to Mediterranean ports in response to a wireless call for help.

"To the glory of Almighty God, and in loving memory of those passengers, officers and men who lost their lives in the foundering of the steamship Titanic on April 15, 1912, I, David Hummell Greer, Bishop of New York, and President of the Seamen's Church Institute of New York, do solemnly dedicate the Titanic Memorial Lighthouse Tower." These words were spoken at the Seamen's Church Institute, 25 South Street, New York, on April 15, 1913, the first anniversary of the greatest marine disaster on record. The wall of the institute will bear a tablet with this inscription:

THIS LIGHTHOUSE TOWER IS A MEMORIAL TO THE PASSENGERS, OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE STEAMSHIP TITANIC
Who Died as Heroes When That Vessel Sank
After Collision with an Iceberg
Latitude 41° 46′ North
Longitude 50° 14′ West
APRIL 15, 1912

Erected by Public Subscription
1913

The lighthouse has been chartered by the United States Government, and the lights will have a range of twelve miles.

During the year that elapsed between the catastrophe and the dedication of the memorial tower, much was done in the way of practical application of the lessons taught by it. Among these results are: the change of the route of steamships across the North Atlantic, so that icebergs may be avoided, and an international agreement on common requirements by governments for the protection of life at sea.

Lifeboat equipment has received much consideration—the number of boats carried by vessels having been materially increased. Some ships now carry power boats able to face rough sea, and capable of use for towing in case of need.

Amendments to the present law as to wireless telegraphy, which became effective on October 1, were largely based on facts brought out at the Titanic hearing. For example, the single operator on the Carpathia was about to go off duty when the call for help came; the present regulations now demand an equipment of two or more operators. By the wireless telegraph treaty of London, signed July 5, 1912, and which is expected to be ratified soon, thereby becoming effective July 1 next, all the important nations enter upon an agreement for the development of the greatest international usefulness of wireless telegraphy without interference with its progress, improvement and perfection.

RELIEF FOR THE OHIO VALLEY

MR. E. R. JOHNSTONE ONCE MORE THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S REPRESENTATIVE AT THE SCENE OF DISASTER
$3,500 ALREADY APPORTIONED AND MORE TO FOLLOW. CONDITIONS IN THE SMALLER CITIES AND TOWNS

THERE never was a more worthy appeal made to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers than that in behalf of the sufferers from the Ohio River floods. From Marietta, Ohio, to Huntington, W. Va., throughout a district 130 miles long and ten miles wide, the suffering has been appalling. The principal towns, Marietta, Ohio; Parkersburg, Point Pleasant and Huntington, W. Va., were in greater part submerged for days by the unprecedented floods. In some places the resistless currents washed away the very soil and in others deposited huge layers of disease-breeding mud and refuse, and everywhere brought intense suffering and need. In the districts specified there are fully 100,000 people, and there is not one but suffered directly or indirectly.

"Thousands saw all, or at any rate the larger part of their worldly possessions swept away or irretrievably damaged. Governor Hatfield of West Virginia, his staff officers and the men of two regiments of National Guard were early on the ground to supervise the distribution of State and national aid. This was given for immediate relief, and has answered its purpose admirably. Those in the affected towns who were able gave freely to relieve their suffering neighbors. In spite of this, however, thousands of poor people, especially in such suburbs and small towns as Belleville, Mason City, Ravenswood, Guyandotte, Central City, Ceredo and Kenova, all in West Virginia, are in desperate need of help for the future. Much of the State and national relief money had to be expended for the removal of filth by the flood, lest an epidemic of disease ensue and bring death and added suffering. Included in the class which is in dire need of assistance are many comparatively poor laborers, small storekeepers and those who made their livings from some small trade, and whose homes, with all their belongings, went into the insatiate river. To the flood of the swollen Ohio were added torrents from the Great Kanawha, the Little Kanawha and the Guyan Rivers. Along the valleys of all these streams there are other sufferers, but the principal losses are in the valley of the Ohio proper. Sitting in the upper story of her house in Point Pleasant, with the water all about them, a lady reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD said to one of the members of her family, 'If we ever get out of this when the floods recede, I shall write the whole story to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Its readers have given cheerfully before to relieve suffering all over the world and our poor will be in terrible need. I know their cry for help will never be allowed to go unheeded by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers in the United States.' All who send contributions to this fund may rest assured that their gifts will be worthily applied and not wasted. They will bring hope and courage into hundreds of homes, where now despair and woful fear brood. I have secured the co-operation of committees of the highest character in Marietta, Parkersburg, Point Pleasant and Huntington. All of these committees agree to distribute the funds entrusted to them only after careful inquiry, and Governor Hatfield, through his trained staff, will lend full assistance to the work."

LOST AND UNIDENTIFIED CHILDREN GATHERED FROM THE STREETS AFTER THE FLOOD AND CARED FOR BY THE RELIEF WORKERS

This is the first telegraphed statement of the flood conditions in the Ohio Valley by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S special representative, Mr. E. R. Johnstone. To most of our readers, this name will recall the service Mr. Johnstone has done for the charitable enterprises of CHRISTIAN HERALD readers in times past. Through the days of the distribution of relief to the reconcentrados in Cuba after the close of the Spanish-American War, Mr. Johnstone superintended the work and kept us informed as to its progress. In 1907 he sailed on the government troop ship Buford, with the cargo that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers sent to China for the relief of the flood sufferers in the district along the Grand Canal. This distribution was made from Chinkiang, and with one hundred substations covered a large part of five provinces.

When the request was made to Mr. Johnstone that he enter the old work again, he immediately agreed, and with a speed that recalled the days of his active newspaper career rushed off to Parkersburg, W. Va. There he met Mayor Murdock, who quickly consented to become chairman of the committee for Parkersburg, Belfont, Belleville, St Marys and other small towns within a fifteen-mile radius. Late the same afternoon Mr. Johnstone reached Point Pleasant and found himself surrounded by the evidences of the eighteen-foot flood that had swept through that town. Here Mr. Bowyer, the cashier of the Merchants' National Bank, consented to head THE CHRISTIAN HERALD committee for Point Pleasant, Henderson and the surrounding small towns.

That evening Mr. Johnstone was summoned by telephone to meet Governor Hatfield at Charlestown, so after visiting several small towns with Mr. Bowyer, he proceeded to Charlestown. The governor urged him to visit Huntington, W. Va., a city of 40,000 people, where the damage had been tremendous and the suffering almost unparalleled. The governor detailed Captain Wood of his staff to accompany Mr. Johnstone and lend every possible assistance. In Huntington, a committee consisting of Dr. A. J. Hiatt, the pastor of the Methodist Church, Mr. D. E. Abbott, chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, and Mr. J. H. Long, editor of the Huntington Advertiser, was appointed. Mr. Johnstone writes of that day: "I traveled one hundred and twenty-five miles in and about Huntington in company with Editor Long, and saw enough to make my heart ache."

Getting about by whatever means he can, riding where it is necessary and using automobiles where there are any wagon-roads left, Mr. Johnstone is covering the affected territory that has not received the aid of the large funds which were subscribed for the relief of the Ohio cities.

Mr. Johnstone's experience in the distribution of relief and the fact that he is at the present time working over the country that he has known from his earliest boyhood assures us that all the aid which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers can provide for this need in our own Family will be well administered. All contributions should be sent to the Western Flood Relief Fund, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

No supplies or clothing should be forwarded to New York. Both for the saving of time and express charges they should be forwarded to some point of need in the flooded territory.

MODERN DISCIPLESHIP

A SERMON

BY

Rev. Charles M. Sheldon, D.D.*

TEXT: "Follow thou me." John 21: 22

THESE words were spoken to Peter nearly two thousand years ago, when Christianity was writing its first chapter in the world's history. It was a vastly different world from the one into which we are born. When we stop to consider the number of things which are different to-day from those in the time of Christ and Peter, we are obliged to see that it is, indeed, a different world. Sit down and list the things in our civilization which Peter never knew.

All the modern things of transportation, of electric power, everything connected with the printing press, with modern education, with political governments, with advancement made in science and surgery were entirely unknown to the first element of Christianity. A man who was consigned to an Eastern penitentiary fifty years ago was recently pardoned by the governor. When he stepped out of that prison he stepped into a world which was entirely different from the one he had left half a century ago. There are more new things in the world which have come into it within the last fifty years than came into it in the five hundred years preceding.

But in spite of the fact that the world has changed so marvelously, human beings are just the same. There is no change in human nature. Man and woman are still the same creatures as those who lived in Christ's and Peter's time. They have the same need of forgiveness of sin, they have the same need of the love of God and one another. Changes in the world have not affected the great common needs of the heart of mankind.

What did this command of Jesus to Peter mean when he spoke it to Peter? It may be well to state a few things which it meant to the disciples then.

Seek Ye First the Kingdom

First: It meant putting the kingdom of God above everything else. Peter understood by these two words that he was to make his first purpose in life the building up of this kingdom about which the Master had been talking. He was not to make money-making the first thing; he was not to make the search for power or pleasure the first thing; but everything else in Peter's world was to be secondary to this flaming desire to make the kingdom of God the first importance.

Second: Peter understood by these two words that no matter what happened to him he was to obey. Death itself was not to be considered by the side of obedience. All the disciples understood by the command "Follow me" just what Peter did and all of them obeyed even when it meant death.

Third: Peter understood by these two words that Jesus Christ was the great authority of life—no one else was to be the Master, not even father or mother were to have greater authority over his greater life than the Master. All the early disciples understood that he was the Lord of lords and King of kings, and if anything in their world stood in the way of his commands it must be put aside.

These things were meant by these words "Follow me" in Peter's time; what do they mean now, in these modern days in which we live?

If they mean anything, they mean exactly the same, and if they do mean the same things, we have a right to ask a certain number of questions.

First: Is Christianity in modern times filled with the same eloquent spirit which was known to the early disciples? Does it have in it the same willingness to suffer martyrdom? Is it obedient to the same authoritative force? Some one asked the question the other day whether there was anything in the world now worth dying for. Does the average member of the average church have in him the consciousness of things he would die for if it were necessary? How much sacrifice is there in the average church membership? How many people in the church are actually willing to bear some kind of a little cross which they have taken up to follow their Master?

These questions naturally follow if we accept the fact that Christianity to-day has the right to utter the same command which Christ uttered to Peter, and the Master has the right to ask his people if modern life has changed in any particular the meaning of Christian discipleship. Does it mean as much to be a Christian now as it did then? Does it call for as much belief, as much heroism, as much sacrifice?

If we believe that it does, may it not be well for us in pew and pulpit to put before our young people constantly the heroic side of Christianity? And may we not be failing in presenting the greatness of our religion if we do not present the highest kind of heroic discipleship?

The Gospel of Great Things

The modern church is beginning to learn that the men of to-day will respond to great things better than to little ones. In a large and wealthy city on this continent a young man, secretary of a Christian Association, called together his little group of assistants and said to them, "We have a very poor plant in this great city with which to carry on our work. There is wealth enough among the public men of this town to help us put up a great and powerful association building, and I think the time has come for us to begin a campaign and give these men the great privilege of taking some of the money which belongs to God and putting it into this service." One of the assistants said, "How much shall we ask them to give, $50,000?" Another assistant spoke up and said, "At least $100,000." But the general secretary calmly said, "We need $500,000 for a plant which is equal to the common demands of this city." The little circle of young men was dumbfounded at the thought of such an amount of money to be raised, but the leader insisted that it was none too great, and after several days of prayer and counsel they began the canvass for the entire amount of one-half million.

At first the business men of the city were astounded at such an appeal, but in a short time they began to say, "This must mean business on a large scale. Such an association will do a tremendous work here where it is so greatly needed." In a few months the entire amount of money was subscribed. It is probable that if they had set the figure at $50,000 they would have failed. Ministers are, consequently, finding out that the appeal to their people for great things is far more effective than a begging timidity, which asks for little things. The heroic element in Christianity has always appealed to men in every age of the world.

The element of sacrifice is also one which needs emphasis in this modern world. If to follow Jesus in Peter's time meant actual death, as it did to hundreds and thousands, why should not obedience to the same command to-day mean death to selfish ambitions or selfish amusements? If they have a right to some of these luxuries in a civilization which has more abundant things than any age has ever known, why should not their Christianity also teach them that things must be sacrificed as well as enjoyed in order to follow the Master?

Christianity's Modern Needs

Great things are awaiting the activities of the church which will call for vast expenditure of time, energy and wealth; if the modern world is rich in numberless ways such as Peter never knew, all the more reason why it should take of this wealth and pour it out lavishly in the construction of Christian civilization. There is, for example, in the hands of Christian people to-day actual wealth enough to establish in twelve different cities of the United States a great Christian daily newspaper which would be a tremendous help to the church. To found such a paper it would be necessary to endow it. It would also call for a small army of young men and women to edit it, secure its news and publish it in a Christian manner. The great daily papers of this country are not, as a rule, owned and controlled and managed in the interests of a devout Christian discipleship. Hundreds of towns are at this moment fighting for clean civilization free from the saloon and vice with no help whatever from the printed page of the day and in very many cases with actual antagonism to reform movements on the part of the daily press where there is an opportunity for the discipleship of Jesus to show itself. Peter's obedience to the command "Follow me" meant certain things very great to him, ending with martyrdom. Modern obedience to the same command means an entirely different thing in the use of God's wealth for consecrated power. If the men of honest wealth in our church to-day want to follow Jesus in ways that will multiply the power of his kingdom, here is a wide open door.

There is also for modern discipleship the magnificent opportunity to follow Jesus by uniting Christendom. The denominations have finished their work. The great need of modern Christianity is federation. The spirit of the people is ready to respond to this cry. It will call for sacrifice of a different kind from that which Peter showed, but of the same spirit. The great publishing houses connected with our different denominations ought to unite and publish a great undenominational missionary magazine which would give to all the members of the churches the news of the kingdom around the world. If that were done, it would be an exhibition of loyalty, as much an evidence of Christian faith as Peter's willingness to be crucified.

Vast change could be wrought in the history of civilization if the disciples of to-day followed the Master in the modern world as closely as Peter followed him in his. There would be a combined effort to abolish war; selfish forms of commercial and industrial greed would be swept aside; political hatred and racial differences would be overcome.

Is Martyrdom a Lost Art?

During the Boxer rebellion in North China twelve years ago, I happened to be in London attending the World's Convention of the Christian Endeavor Society. When I returned home I found in my mail a small card, both sides of which contained Chinese characters. One of the ministers in North China had sent this card to me and with it a letter explaining it. He said that when the Boxer Rebellion broke out he had a class of Chinese converts whom he was training in the Christian life. These boys had taken as a pledge for their daily conduct the question, "What would Jesus do?" and were honestly trying to live it out. The Boxers seized and put to death many Christians in that province. These cards were printed by the missionaries and contained on them sentences telling the young converts what it meant to be a Christian. They were a witness to their Christian faith, and the boys knew that if the cards were found on their persons the Boxers would know that they were Christians and put them to death. They could have torn the cards up or hidden them, but instead of that they carried them under their blouses and many of them were murdered by the Boxers when they found these cards upon their persons. One of the cards was taken from the dead body of one of these Christian disciples and sent by the minister to me. Every time I look at it it reminds me of the fact that there are still living in the world those who are ready to follow the Master even unto death.

It will not hurt the members of the churches of this country to ask themselves whether, in case the emergency should arise, they would die for him whom they call Lord. What more could any one do than these Chinese lads did? Martyrdom is not yet a lost art. When it is we may despair of civilization and Christianity will be a lost religion, but the modern Christian in the modern world of work, of hurry, of seeking after money, power and pleasure, may well ask himself as he enters the church, or as he lives surrounded by luxury, in what particular he is actually obeying the command of Jesus, "Follow me." At some point or other in the age in which we are living we must obey these two words or we cannot call ourselves disciples. The exact ways in which we can obey may be different from those in which Peter obeyed, but the command of Jesus to his disciples has never been changed and has never been taken back.

In modern ways, modern Christianity must express itself, and I like to believe that even to-day there is a living response to the same voice which spoke to Peter; and in obedience to that simple command Christianity will go on to conquer the world.

WASHINGTON'S WELCOME BREAKFAST

THE LADIES OF THE CAPITAL WELCOME THE LADIES OF THE PRESIDENT'S OFFICIAL FAMILY TO WASHINGTON

A "NATIONAL WELCOME" Breakfast was extended by the Washington women to Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Marshall, Mrs. Champ Clark, and the ladies of the cabinet families on Saturday, April 5, at Rauscher's fashionable Connecticut Avenue banqueting place in Washington. It was the first event of its kind ever given in honor of a President's wife, and therefore marked a new era in Washington's social calendar.

This pleasant greeting to the women of the new administration was planned wholly by women. Partisan lines were entirely eliminated and the welcome was without the slightest political significance. It was Mrs. Stephen B. Ayers who conceived the thought of the breakfast, and, as chairman of the committee of arrangements, carried it to successful culmination. The first thought was to have made it a party affair, but wiser second thought made it altogether independent. Mrs. Matthew T. Scott, president general of the Daughters of the American Revolution, was the hostess and filled the part gracefully. Three hundred and eighty-five ladies were present. The guests of honor were at a long table on a slightly raised platform west of the dining hall. Mrs. Wilson sat at the hostess's right, Mrs. Marshall at her left, followed by the ladies of the cabinet in their ranking order at either side. The others were seated at round tables, ten guests at each. The large dining hall was draped with the national colors and set with potted plants, while cut flowers adorned the tables. Mrs. Scott's address of welcome was short but felicitous. Then for an hour the breakfast, at which there was no wine, but which was delightfully served, occupied everybody's attention. Then Mrs. Scott introduced Mrs. Abby Gunn Baker, the well-known Washington writer and corspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, who gave an illustrated lecture on "The Historic White House," which had the marked attention of the distinguished audience. The reception to Mrs. Wilson, Mrs. Marshall, and the ladies of the cabinet circle then followed, each guest being presented by Mrs. Ayers.

DO YOU KNOW YOUR BIBLE?

WE ARE having such a vigorous and victorious Bible Class this year that we can hardly find space to publish the names of those who answer all the questions correctly. The last names on the previous Honor Roll have not yet been printed; they will appear in an early number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

We must beg our readers to be patient when any apparent misunderstanding arises over the answers. Many correct lists arrive too late to be counted. For instance, a friend writes that he mailed his answers on March 11. They arrived in our office March 13; and March 12 was the closing date. Occasionally a reader makes an error in copying his list for mailing, so that the list we receive is wrong, while the list he keeps at home is right. In cases where it is a matter of judgment, we must, of course, use our own judgment here, and it is often impossible to take time to make personal explanations as to why the answers suggested by our readers are incorrect.

One other matter: Be sure to state the Scripture references with every answer. And write the references plainly. Sometimes a figure is so carelessly written that it is liable to be misread in the office.

Occasionally, of course, we do make a mistake at this end. For instance, Mr. John Bissett's name should have appeared among those who sent five correct lists for 1912:

THE GREAT FINANCIER'S FUNERAL

THE funeral of the late J. Pierpont Morgan, which took place on April 14, was conducted with the utmost simplicity. At ten o'clock the remains of the late financier reached St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, of which Mr. Morgan was for many years senior warden. The casket was completely hidden beneath a great blanket of red roses, the only spot of white being a little cross woven at the head of the coffin. The choir and officiating clergymen met the funeral party which had come from Mr. Morgan's late residence. Behind the choirs of St. George's walked Bishop Lawrence of Massachusetts, Bishop Brewster of Connecticut, Bishop Greer of New York and the clergy of the church, headed by Dr. Karl Reiland, the rector. Bishop Lawrence began the service in the usual manner with the quotation "I am the resurrection and the life, saith the Lord. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live."

Some months before his death Mr. Morgan prepared instructions as to the kind of funeral he desired, and these were followed out to the letter. There was no eulogy of the deceased and with the exception of the solo "Calvary," sung by the baritone soloist of the choir, all the music was taken from the regular church hymnal. The ceremony of the Episcopal Book of Common Prayer was carried out without deviation, and the remains of the late Mr. Morgan, after the services, were taken to the Grand Central Station, where a special train was waiting to carry the funeral party to Hartford, Conn., where interment was made in the afternoon.

The crowds which gathered near St. George's to witness what they had supposed would be a very imposing funeral procession were held back by strong lines of police, and only those to whom cards had been sent were permitted to approach the church. The seating capacity of the church was taxed to its utmost. Fifteen hundred cards were issued and it is believed all were used. It is quite certain that the little church never before held such a distinguished gathering. Men whose names are household words as the leaders in their arts, professions and callings were present to pay the last tribute of friendship and respect to the late Mr. Morgan. Thirty-five national and civic organizations were represented and almost every department of American life was shown in these groups. There were artists, men of letters, men representing great business interests, historical and national societies, church organizations and scientific bodies as well as social organizations.

During the days that elapsed between the arrival of the remains of the late Mr. Morgan on the steamship La France and the date of the funeral the body lay in state in the library of his Madison Avenue home. The great tribute of flowers was divided between the library and the church. Among the thousands of these tributes, both large and small, there were many showing the high esteem in which Mr. Morgan was held in Europe. At the library was an immense sheaf of lilies knotted with white satin ribbon embroidered with the folden fleur-de-lis of the royal house of Bourbon, and held together by the coronet of the princes and princesses of the royal house of France.

There were also tributes from art societies and organizations in Europe, from men prominent in the governments of many lands, and in two cases officially from the governments themselves. A tiny stream of red, white and blue ribbons that held together a great spray of palm leaves indicated the gift of the French Government. A wreath of lilies of the valley and orchids came from the Italian Government. These were at the church, together with a wonderful wreath of American Beauty roses, the green, white and red ribbon of which showed that it was the gift of the King of Italy. The tribute of Emperor William of Germany was a spray of palm leaves with silk streamers ending in golden tassels. A great garland of violets which bore a card from Ambassador Bryce of Great Britain served a double purpose, for it was the British Government's tribute as well as the expression of the warm personal feeling of Mr. Bryce for the late Mr. Morgan.

CASKET OF THE LATE J. PIERPONT MORGAN BORNE FROM ST. GEORGE'S CHURCH

The bishops of Massachusetts and Connecticut accompanied the remains to Hartford and conducted the short and simple ceremony at the Cedar Hill Cemetery, where the interment was made. In deference to Mr. Morgan's expressed wish that his funeral should be attended with no ostentation, Hartford made no display for the occasion. A wreath was placed at the entrance of the City Hall and another at the entrance of the Junius Spencer Morgan Memorial. All the flags of the city were at half mast and great crowds thronged the streets to watch the simple little procession of the hearse and five carriages pass on its way to Cedar Hill.

The big city fire bell tolled at intervals of twenty seconds till the number seventy-six was reached, one for each year of Mr. Morgan's age. The chimes of Christ Church played "Abide with Me," "Lead, Kindly Light," and a number of other familiar hymns, one of which was "Asleep in Jesus." This was Mr. Morgan's special request, and was also sung at the funeral service in St. George's earlier in the day.

During the time that the services were taking place here in America a memorial service was being held in Westminster Abbey, London; another in the American Church in the Avenue d'Alama in Paris, and in the American Church in Rome.

Mr. Morgan went to his last mortal resting-place with all the tributes that are awarded to the great men of the world, for he had, largely by his own efforts, come to control vast industrial and financial interests which he administered always with a sincere sense of stewardship. His vast donations to hospitals, for scientific research work, for the preservation and betterment of the art and letters of America, have placed his name in a position where it will long be remembered after the fact that he was a wealthy man has been practically forgotten.

EARTHQUAKES IN GUATEMALA

DURING December and January subterranean mutterings were distinctly heard almost daily in Guatemala City and the districts eastward. Early in February slight earthquakes commenced to be a daily occurrence, sometimes as many as eight or ten distinct shocks being felt during the day and night. On Saturday morning, March 8, at 9.45, I was in an office in the center of the city when we suddenly felt a shock of more than usual force. Stepping out on the street, we noticed the electric light poles, wires and globes swinging and the great cathedral on the plaza swaying. Arriving at home, Mrs. Bishop told us that the great arched entrance was cracked and pieces of the heavy cornice had fallen.

But what was taking place in the capital was as nothing compared to conditions in towns fifty miles to the east. Telegraph poles were thrown down. Cuajiniquilapa, the county seat of the department of Santa Rosa (a town of some four or five thousand), was the principal point of disaster. Other towns were damaged, but not a single edifice of the county seat remained intact. About two hundred persons were killed outright, and hundreds wounded, some dying afterwards. One of the saddest incidents was the death of about sixty school children. The superintendent, a Christian man who taught last year in our own mission school in the capital, escaped with three or four pupils, the other two teachers and the rest of the children being killed.

Since the Cuajiniquilapa disaster the earth continues almost constantly in a quiver, and daily quakes take place. Even at Guatemala City the quakes are still severe and multitudes are sleeping in the yards, plazas, and wide streets, being warned by a public proclamation not to sleep indoors.

About a year ago we opened up mission work there and the opposition was just commencing to give way. Out of a little congregation of twenty people, not one of the believers was killed—one child being the only victim among the Gospel people. Their escape seemed purely providential. Enemies are saying that the earthquakes come because of the presence of the Gospel people and threats are made to kill the school superintendent, who is accused of the deaths of the children.

EARTHQUAKE RUINS AT ANTIGUA, THE OLD CAPITAL OF GUATEMALA

There are nineteen volcanoes in Guatemala, the greatest having an altitude of 16,300 feet. There are fifteen in Salvador, thirteen in Nicaragua, and twelve in Costa Rica. In 1835 the volcano Cosiguina, in Nicaragua (only 3,835 feet high), erupted, sending forth her ashes in a circle of 1,500 miles diameter. The republics of Nicaragua and Salvador were in darkness for three days, and the thunderings were heard as far as Oajaca, Mexico. Santa Maria, the volcano which nearly destroyed Quezaltenango on April 18, 1892, erupting on October 25 of the same year, covered villages, towns and country with an ashy sand to the depth of from two to fifteen feet.

The severe disturbance in Guatemala City by the present earthquakes is alarming. The present situation of the capital was chosen because it was believed to be exempt from destruction by earthquake.

In connection with our Central American mission station located in Guatemala City, we have sixteen native workers. For seventeen years we have prayed, toiled, and labored for souls, and especially for the training of a native ministry. God is giving us precious fruit. Eight native workers, located at points ranging from thirty-five to one hundred and forty miles from the capital, report fifty-seven conversions for the month of February. We now have three native workers giving special attention to the Indians, of whom there are one million in the republic.

THE LIGHT

BY JEAN MAHAN PLANK

A Story Complete in This Issue

PHEBE DOLE will make a good and proper wife for thee, Abner Evans, even though she is a bit of a child yet."

Abner, being but little past twenty-one, was not too old to flush with embarrassment at the words of his elderly, Quaker-clad companion. Standing with one foot upon the step of his father's delivery machine, the youth stooped his tall, thin figure to pick a pink geranium from the base of a young palm. A gleam shone in his eyes, however, as Matthew Coffin mentioned the name of Abner's betrothed.

"Indeed, thee is right, Mr. Coffin," he responded eagerly, as he straightened himself, and buttoned his sack coat rather nervously; for the younger generation of the little colony of Friends, in a suburb of Los Angeles, toward the sea, were not addicted to the quaint old costume, nor did they always use the "plain" speech, unless in company with their elders.

Matthew Coffin's gentle face took on anxious lines. He was a stout man, and, being rather short, he had to look up at his young friend.

"But thee must remember, Abner Evans," he cautioned, "that marriage is not a mere matter of the flesh. There must be a wedding of the spirit, too; a union in the Lord. Has thee talked of holy things with Phebe Dole?"

Abner felt of his necktie. A dull red crossed his cheeks. "Well—you see—that is, not yet, Mr. Coffin." With nervous slender fingers he thoughtlessly crushed the pungent geranium blossom. We—haven't quite had time yet, you know."

Abner did not like to confess this disconcerting fact: being a conscientious chap, he really had thought many times of speaking to Phebe about "holy things"; but how—when a pair of the loveliest eyes possessed by woman were gazing adoringly into his, and a pair of the rosiest lips ever kissed by man were being kissed by him—how was a fellow to think of anything beside just Phebe herself? And as for "holy things," didn't Abner feel, every time he took the girl in his arms, that the angels themselves must smile at thought of the wonderful, incomprehensible gift that God had bestowed upon Abner's unworthy self?

"Thee'll think of it, Abner Evans?" questioned Matthew, kindly, as he turned away.

"I will, Mr. Coffin!" was the boy's cheery answer. He stepped into the machine, and lifted his hat to the elder man, who waddled off briskly down a rose-bordered lane.

That very evening, Abner walked with Phebe through perfumed streets where the outlines of great palms were mellowed in the moonlight to a plume-like softness. The moon itself, round and rosy like a child's pink balloon, was just appearing above the floating pepper-trees. It threw its mystic rays into a sweet little face framed by a wide band of cerise velvet about the rich, brown braids of hair. The face came just to Abner's shoulder, and it added to its other charms the inevitable charm of youth.

Two hours they were together, walking, talking, and sitting among the roses on the wide porch. Then, when they parted, Abner was lifted to a still higher heaven by a sudden swift clinging upon the part of the girl, as she laid her soft cheek against his arm in an abandon that had never before broken through her usual dainty reserve; and Phebe sobbed as she said:

"Abner—oh, Abner! If I were to lose you, I could not live, now! I love you, Abner!"

Not until Abner was ecstatically preparing for sleep, did he recall that no word had he spoken to Phebe about "holy things."

The following day was Friday. Through its hours, the boy was busy delivering the products of his father's tea store. Late in the afternoon, he had left the machine at the garage, and was walking slowly home along an avenue that faced the Sierra. The valley, he could discern, lay in the shadow of approaching twilight, but the whole length of the Sierra Madre was still bathed in a mellow golden light. The tower of the observatory on Mount Wilson was like a white spirit-finger pointing upward.

Suddenly the lad stopped still in his tracks, breathless with marveling. The awe and delight with which Adam might have welcomed the angel, held him for a brief instant spellbound. As vivid as an electric shock, there flashed over his whole being an impression that brought with it conviction, which left no more room for doubt—nor as much, indeed, as the fact that when he came to himself the Sierra still stretched its accustomed length before his eyes, though the light had faded, and the spirit-finger had disappeared.

Then the boy gave a low cry of horrified dismay. He knew well what had happened to him. It was what Henry Seidel Canby calls "the noble, dangerous theory of the Inward Light." Long had Abner's mother, a gentle, sweet-faced Quakeress of the old school, prayed that this sacred gift might be bestowed upon her only son; but she could not have dreamed that when the convincing flash did really envelop the boy, the awed ecstasy of its visitation must of necessity give place to a realization that would leave her son stricken with anguish. For the Light had left a strange message.

It was quite in keeping with the characteristics of this Holy Gleam that it should convey a quantity of information in a single flash; and when Abner, going blindly on with white lips, slowly repeated the dazzling words of the impression, they took this form:

"Thou shalt seek, on next First-day, in the meeting-house at Pasadena, the woman whom thou shalt love in the Lord!"

Abner walked on slowly toward his home, but the beauty was gone from sky and mountain. The perfumed air sickened him, for it recalled the delicately vague aroma of violets that always seemed to emanate from Phebe's flower-like person. Slowly and heavily he went up the graveled path to his father's door.

The gentle figure in gray, standing in the entrance, laid a hand upon the boy's shoulder. A half merry smile trembled about the fine lips.

"Thy head is bowed, my son; is it a problem in Euclid, or has Phebe Dole forgotten to telephone twice to-day?"

Abner looked haggardly at his mother. He drew her into her own bedroom, and closed the door.

"Mother!" he gasped, "when the Inward Light comes, is there no way—must it surely be obeyed?"

Abigail Evans caught her son in her arms with a glad cry.

"The Light! Thee has the Light? Oh, my son!"

Abner, with an agonized gesture, put his hand to his forehead.

"Mother, tell me! Must it always be followed, no matter what it says?"

"Oh, my child!" Abigail's face grew serious to consternation. "Thee must surely obey. And it is best that thee keep the wisdom to thyself. To tell to others is not wise. But surely obey!" She looked anxiously at her son's white face. "It can but lead to good, Abner. The path may seem rough, but it is the Lord who calls thee, and he will be ever beside thee. When the Light comes, it proves that thee is in the path, and all lions are chained, thee will find. Come! Thee must have a bit of tea. The guidance is new to thee, and thee is upset. Thee will find the way opening—perhaps in the morning. Be sure thee can always trust the Light, my son; thee need never have a fear; it can but lead thee to peace."

As she turned toward the dining-room, Abner followed mechanically. Peace — without Phebe! Daylight — without a sun!

The way did open. Abner, the following morning, was sitting at the breakfast table, pretending to eat the hot muffins his mother was anxiously pressing upon him, when his father was called to the telephone. A matter of business required a trip to Pasadena.

"Thee will have to go, son," said the father as he hung up the trumpet, "for thee can manage just as well as I, and I must be here. Thee can leave by this afternoon's train—the Saturday's delivery will be over by three, surely—and if thee doesn't get the business done this evening, thee can remain in Pasadena over First-day, and stay with John and Alice Peasley. Then thee can finish on Monday."

Abner had been sitting with a mute, despairing gaze turned into his coffee-cup. His Quaker

"AT THE HOSPITAL FOR THE RELIEF OF CHILDREN—THE GIVING UP OF A BABY"

From a painting by Jean Geoffroy

THIS striking picture was exhibited at the Paris Salon of 1912, and immediately attracted the attention of two continents. It was one of the most closely studied and widely discussed of a group of striking pictures which reflect the life of our own times—a characteristic which has not been strongly evident in recent British or American picture exhibits. M. Geoffroy's canvas shows us a distressed young widow in the depth of her bereavement evidently obliged by circumstances to relinquish her babe to the care of a charitable institution. Deep sorrow and the hopelessness of despair look from her eyes as she gazes past the child in the arms of a competent nurse, back into a different past. With pen poised for the stroke the head of the department awaits the broken answers that give the child's history for the records of the hospital.

China Asks Christian Prayers

IT IS difficult to be moderate in commenting upon the action of the Chinese Government in requesting all the Christian churches and missions in the new republic to set apart a day of prayer for the divine guidance and blessing in the affairs of the nation. Has anything more spectacular and stupendous happened in the modern history of Christianity? It reminds one of the act of Constantine that made Christianity the religion of the great Roman Empire and the sign of the cross the banner of its imperial legions, or of the zeal of Charlemagne in subjecting pagan nations to the yoke of Christ. Japan recently made Christianity one of the recognized religions of the empire. And now China, the newest and largest republic, which during all the centuries of the Christian era has been thought of as so deeply and firmly heathen, sends this request for prayer not to its priests of Buddha nor to its wise men of Confucianism, but to the faithful missionaries and native workers who have been telling there the old, old story of Jesus and his love, and holding up to view the life and character of Him who said, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me."

It is beautiful to note the changing methods that have come with the changing years. Here is no compulsion, no sword, no fagot. The youthful nation, rising to test its new-found strength, does not issue an edict making Christianity the state religion; it compels none of its four hundred million citizens to accept it. It simply asks those who name the name of Christ to pray for the nation. It could have done no saner, nobler thing. The new nation has started well. Naming this fadeless name, it may confidently proclaim: "God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear him."

The day of prayer set was April 27. Prayer was asked for the National Assembly, for the new government, for the president of the republic who is to be elected, for the constitution of the republic, for the recognition of the republic by the Powers, for the maintenance of peace and for the election of strong and virtuous men to office.

The Prevention of Floods

IF THE great floods which have proved so destructive to life and property in the Middle West convey any lesson, it is that deforestation is a real evil and that instead of blindly laying the blame for the visitation on Providence —or fate—we must look for causes to which we ourselves may have unwittingly contributed. Fully one-sixth of our population is to be found in the near neighborhood of the great central waterways. They are entitled to the best protection the States and the nation can devise. What form that protection shall take will doubtless be considered in the near future. Deforestation is unquestionably one of the primary causes of frequent floods. Conservation officials claim that the reckless cutting of forests at the head waters of the streams in the flat lands of the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys promotes floods and should be discontinued or greatly modified. On the other hand, the chiefs of the United States Geological Survey urge as the immediate need a better levee and aqueduct system. This, on a scale sufficient to include all the affected States, would cost not less than $500,000,000; but it would be a wise investment. Ohio's flood damage bill alone may reach $100,000,000 this spring. This is not a project for the States exclusively, but for the nation. We are abundantly able to afford the best system of water storage and flood defense that science can devise and which the ablest engineers can construct. There should be no tinkering or patchwork in dealing with so vast a project and one upon which the happiness and welfare of many millions depend.

Meanwhile a great wave of sympathy is sweeping over the country. There could be no finer illustration of the fact that there is a mighty host of God's people at hand, ready at all times to respond to the call of suffering. Readers of this journal who have ever been among the first to reach out hands of help are actively in line with the general movement, and their gifts are finding their way into many homes of suffering, bringing cheer and comfort. Our Special Commissioner is in personal touch with the sufferers in towns and villages where the relief movement had not yet penetrated and is affording systematic aid with the co-operation of local committees, village pastors being well represented in the work wherever practicable. By this method it is hoped to reach many needy ones who would otherwise have been overlooked. It is a grand work and should go on until every member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family has sent in his or her quota of help, and till every accessible case of need has been substantially relieved.

Remembering the "Titanic"

IT WAS on April 15, just a little over a year ago, that the magnificent Titanic went down, carrying with her over fifteen hundred souls. Seldom does any disaster remain long in the public mind, but all the details of the loss of the great ship, the splendid bravery of those who willingly gave up their own lives to save the women and children, and the final scene, as the giant sank to the music of her own requiem—these are among the things that can never be forgotten. On two continents the anniversary of her loss was observed with a reverent sorrow that was mingled with pride in the devotion of those heroes who bequeathed to the whole world a lesson of splendid courage and self-sacrifice. In many ways the grim disaster has proved a gain. Ocean travel has been made safer; every seagoing vessel now carries a full complement of life-saving appliances; "double-skinned" steamers with improved bulkheads are multiplying; an ice-patrol guards the lanes of Atlantic travel, and all liners will soon have a continuous wireless service, day and night. Thus the Titanic has become a sacrifice for the world's safety and comfort, and the turning-point of great and much needed reforms which in the ordinary course of events would hardly have come to pass in twenty years instead of one short twelvemonth.

Back in the Fold

IT IS always a pleasing thing to know that one who had gone wide of the mark has come back to his true moorings. Some years ago, Professor Briggs of Union Theological Seminary took very doubtful ground in relation to certain truths vital to Christianity. In the passing years there has come new light. In his latest book on the Fundamental Christian Faith, just issued, he is now seen to be in loyal accord with all that is esteemed as sound and true. His faith finds its center in Christ, whom he holds to be "very God and very man." He even breaks a lance with the leaders of skepticism, whom he accuses of hiding their agnosticism behind scientific and critical pretense. The whole of Christianity, he finds, revolves around a single center: the divinity of Jesus; the reality of his mission for the salvation of the world, to carry out which he became man; his death and resurrection and his return to the Father. Faith in these essentials he declares to be in accord with reason, with the results of earnest scholarship and with the teachings of the Bible itself. Dr. Briggs's book may be epitomized in a single phrase as his confession of faith. He has sailed a long way over the troubled sea of skepticism; and having sounded its shallows and escaped its perils, he has come out once again into safe waters. After such an experience, his testimony to the conviction of the truth of the Gospel is one that should carry weight with those who are still laboring amid doubts and dangers and trying to construct a theology which, however brilliant it may be, offers nothing to satisfy the soul-hunger that longs for that divine power which alone can give assurance of peace and pardon and the hope of a life beyond the grave.

The Spoils of War

THERE are indications of a break-up of the Balkan Alliance over the division of war spoils. Bulgaria wants Salonica, which Greece captured, to console her for the loss of Silistria, which Roumania claims as "compensation for neutrality." Servia is chagrined at the idea of giving up Monastir to Bulgaria, and Montenegro wants part of the province of Novi-Bazar to solace her for her failure to capture Scutari. There is nothing that certain European powers would more heartily welcome than a Balkan disruption. In spite of their differences, however, the Allies will probably hold together, as in that course lies their only hope of ultimate mutual advantage. United, and with the momentum of recent victories, they might be invincible; yet not one of them could stand alone before the assault of a single European Power. Austria's attitude indicates a danger which might become very real should the Balkan Alliance be disrupted. Besides, Russia, whose influence with the Allies is unquestioned, may be expected to employ that influence in keeping them united. Another factor that will conduce to cohesion is the extraordinary growth of the Pan-Slav movement, which has more of latent potentiality to-day than at any other time in recent history. To the great Slavic races belong Austria's subjects in Herzegovina and Bosnia, the German, Austrian and Russian Poles, and the Bulgarians, Macedonians, Servians and Montenegrins also. Their dream is a union of all the Slavic nations—a hope which Russia has fostered with a view to her own future interests.

No Laid-Aside Instruments

WE SOMETIMES speak of men who are broken in health, or crippled by misfortune, or worn out by age, as "laid aside," and they themselves so think of themselves, and sadly wonder why they are still kept here, and not released by the hand of death. But this is an utterly mistaken view. God has not one laid-aside servant in this world. He has no shelf on which to put up his instruments, because he is never done with them. You need not pray as you sometimes do, "When thou art done with us in this world, take us to thyself in heaven," for the Lord will be very sure to do that. He may change the character of your service; may turn it into something which you dare despise as no service at all, so conceited is our estimate of the importance of our poor little activities. He may say, "I do not want you to be a hero in the battle; I want you to take life's losses and trials and weaknesses and be a hero in them. I do not want you to go with your comrades in the wild charge up that Lookout Mountain; I want you to lie at the foot of the mountain, maimed, perhaps, and only follow the battle with your eye, yet with cheerful patience possessing your heart." But none the less just as honorable and just as honored by him, you shall be his soldier and his servant still. No Christian's commission expires until death. If you are Christ's, you will not die so long as you can be of use, and you will not live one moment after you cease to be of use.

Mexico's New Cabinet

SO RAPID and so spectacular have been the changes in the personnel of the administration of the affairs of the republic of Mexico that the outside world has hardly had an opportunity to learn what the members of that nation's cabinet look like. The accompanying photograph is the first ever taken of President Huerta and his advisers. Though some of the men in this group were identified with the administration of the late President, Francisco I. Madero, there have been some changes. Rodolfo Reyes, who appears at the extreme left of the picture, was reported several weeks ago to have resigned his post as minister of justice so that he might be free to conduct a campaign for the presidency, but though undenied, this report was evidently a mistake. Esquival Obregon, second from the left, succeeded Ernesto Madero as minister of finance at the time of the last national revolution. Francisco de la Barra, the minister of foreign affairs, is a well-known figure, as he has been identified with both the Diaz and Madero governments, and has served as ambassador at Washington. General Manuel Mondragon, minister of war, is standing next to President Huerta. He has held his present post only since the revolution. On the other side of the President are Vera Estanol, minister of education; Garcia Germados, minister of the interior; and Robles Gil, minister of state. The rulers of olden times had their cabinets for counsel and divided responsibility. Artaxerxes in his royal decree authorizing Ezra's return from Babylon expressly states that cabinet action had been taken on the subject, and that the seven members concurred, as this record shows:

Forasmuch as thou art sent of the king, and of his seven counselors, to enquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, according to the law of thy God which is in thine hand. (Ezra 7: 14.)

PRESIDENT HUERTA OF MEXICO AND HIS CABINET

Mimic Duel Fatal

A MIMIC duel fought by two boys of eighteen for a motion picture firm in Hoboken, N. J., recently became a tragedy. As the youths faced each other the operator of the camera prepared for the most striking scene in the picture melodrama of which it was a part. There was silence as the actors in the rôles of seconds stepped aside and a handkerchief fluttered to the ground as a signal for the combat to begin. At the third snap of the pistol a spurt of flame came out of the barrel; the opponent fell, and was hurried to the hospital, where he died. The lad who fired the shot stood motionless with horror at first, then broke into sobs and ran away. As yet the officers of the law have not found him. There is no doubt that this was an accident pure and simple. But the tragedy is not without its blame. Firearms are dangerous things, especially in the hands of the young. It is the "empty" pistol that has killed thousands of people in this country and against which there ought to be better protection. Dueling was a miserable scene for boys to act or for people, especially the children, to see. It is a relic of a more barbarous age and has in it the double sin of suicide and murder, bringing it doubly under the condemnation of the Decalogue:

Enters College Over Ninety

REV. DAVID J. HIGGINS, over ninety years of age, has made application for admission to Hamline University, Minnesota, to complete a course for the degree of doctor of philosophy. In a letter to President Kerfoot of Hamline, Mr. Higgins says that in spite of his advanced age, his interest in philosophical matters has never diminished, and he desires to continue his researches especially in the line of the philosophy of religions. He holds now both bachelor's and master's degrees, and also the honorary degree of doctor of divinity. This mental progress and ambition of the man midway between four and five score appear in unfavorable contrast to the young men who have the time and money for a higher education and do not care for it. Nowhere in literature is there a more beautiful picture of a ripe old man looking out into the progress and joy of a future life than that given by Victor Hugo of himself when he said that he was four score years of age and that many of his physical powers and all of his mental and spiritual faculties had been mercifully preserved to him, that he heard the melodies and breathed the fragrance of the gardens as he did when young, and that he saw the truth and God and the other world with keener eye than ever before; that the snow was on his head, but the flowers of spring in his heart, and that death would not end his life or check his growth; that at death the clock would strike twelve, only to strike one again at the beginning of an eternal day. This experience is echoed in the strength and progress and hope of the new student at Hamline, within ten years of a hundred, who suggests the description of the great religious leader of olden times:

And Moses was a hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. (Deut. 34: 7.)

The Puddler Becomes a Preacher

A LITTLE immigrant boy of eight years came through Castle Garden from Whiton Park, Durham, England, forty-four years ago and went with his father to Ironton, Ohio. His father was a worker in the steel mills and his son took a place as a puddler at the furnaces and worked very hard for years. At the age of twenty-three he could neither read nor write, but his wife was ambitious and aided him, and they pursued their studies together till at the age of thirty-two he found himself equipped with a technical college and seminary education, ready for the ministry. That English immigrant lad is the Rev. Dr. William H. Morgan, who, after sixteen years of a successful pastorate at the Central M. E. Church at Newark, N. J., has just been appointed to the pastorate of the Calvary M. E. Church of New York. The promotion of this man is due to native ability, tireless industry, and character. That which took him from the furnace to the pulpit was the fire of religion that burned in his heart and illuminated his faculties and life. Illustrious sons of immigrants can be found in the pulpits of all denominations and in the highest callings of life, showing the blessings of the good stock of those who have come to us from foreign shores. The self-reliance and hard work so necessary to success in the material and spiritual world and the divine assistance also needed are commended by the apostle in these words:

Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God which worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure. (Phil. 2: 12, 13.)

Pensions for Indigent Mothers

THE other day New Jersey passed a "Mothers' Pension Bill," which provides that widows with children under sixteen who have no means of support shall be paid from the county treasuries a pension of $9 a month for the first child, $5 for the second, and $4 for each additional child. Applications for the granting of these pensions are to be made through the State Board of Children's Guardians and are to be passed upon by the common pleas judges in the different counties. A bill with a similar purpose has just passed the lower house of the legislature of Ohio by a vote of 92 to 4, providing pensions for indigent mothers, and it now goes to Governor Cox for his signature, which is assured. The bill provides an annual tax levy of one-tenth of one mill, which is expected to create an annual fund of $700,000 for mother's pensions. Destitute widows, women whose husbands are completely disabled, have deserted them, or are serving prison sentences, are to be cared for. Nothing better marks the progress of our splendid modern civilization than this provision for indigent mothers. The burdens that fall on motherhood and widowhood are heavy enough, their responsibilities in the formation of individual character and national destiny are so tremendous, that it is proper for the State to lend its helping hand, thus incarnating Christ's Spirit:

Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. (James 1: 27.)

A Modern Court

NEW YORK County is to have the largest court house in the world. Plans have just been adopted for a building larger than the Coliseum of Rome, a mammoth circular structure 275 feet tall, and occupying the space between LaFayette Park and Baxter Street, between Duane Street on the south and Leonard Street on the north. The building is to cost $10,000,000, and Mr. Guy Lowell, of illustrious ancestry, the successful competing architect, is to receive $600,000 as his fees for plans and superintending construction. There is in the building the combination of the beauty of ancient art with the utility required by busy modern times. The circular idea that is at the basis of this unusual building enables one entering at whatever place to go straight to the lobby, where the elevators are arranged in a circle. On the ground floor adjoining the entrances will be the offices of the county clerk, waiting rooms for the public, and consultation rooms for lawyers and newspaper men. On the floors above will be one complete floor for the City Court, and four floors for the Supreme Court. Above the court rooms will be the library and dining-room for the justices, and above all, overlooking the city and bay, will be the justices' chambers. In every well-ordered government the executive, legislative, and judicial departments are all necessary. Moses in the beginning exercised all the functions of government, but his bodily strength was not equal to the task, and at the divine command he organized a judicial system, with courts and judges.

Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the Lord thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. (Deut. 16: 18.)

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, May 4. Job 28: 20-28. "The fear of the Lord, that is wisdom." But what is "the fear of the Lord"? It is not to crouch before him in terror, to crawl along our way, afraid to take our breath! Fear is trembling, but it is not the trembling of the slave. It is rather the trembling of the heart-chords at the touch of the harpist. It is responsiveness to God, sensitiveness to his touch and will.

Now this "fear of the Lord" is wisdom. Being sensitive to the Lord it apprehends the Lord's mind and will. It apprehends the spiritual sides of things. It knows the Lord's "way of looking at things." Even in novel circumstances it understands the King's will. It has "the secret of the Lord."

And this is wisdom as distinguished from knowledge. Knowledge is the lumber of learning: wisdom is insight and vision. Mere knowledge may leave a man blind: wisdom "walks in the light even as He is in the light." Wisdom is intuition: it is the mystic understanding of the mind of God. "The fear of the Lord is the fountain of life," and "the life is the light of men."

MONDAY, May 5. I Corinthians 12: 1-11. Let me meditate upon this word "gifts": "the gifts of the Spirit." There are many people like Simon the Sorcerer: they would have their gifts if only they could be "purchased with money." And others would set more value upon them if only they were the prizes and rewards of culture. Our petty pride recoils from the office and attitude of the beggar, standing at the gate and receiving gifts.

All the most glorious things of life are "free gifts." They are the bounties of grace. They are to be had for the asking, if only behind the asking there is eagerness and truth. If we are willing to receive and entertain the Giver his gifts come with him. The Holy Spirit furnishes our spirit with all needful equipment. He will make us what he would have us be, for all the graces of the sanctified life are in his keeping.

So we must lay aside our big pride, which is only the sign and measure of our littleness. We must make room for the Spirit by emptying ourselves of the petty boast of self-creation. We must not seek to be self-made men but Spirit-made men: and through lowly desire we must receive the great Comforter and the gifts wherewith he enriches the soul with eternal good.

TUESDAY, May 6. I Corinthians 12: 12-19. It is only in the Spirit that real union is born. Every other kind of union is artificial, and mechanical, and dead. We can dovetail many pieces of wood together and make the unity of an article of furniture, but we cannot dovetail items together and make a tree. And it is the union of a tree that we require, a union born of indwelling life. We may join many people together in a fellowship by the bonds of a formal creed, but the result is only a piece of social furniture; it is not a vital communion. There is a vast difference between a connexion and a concord.

Many members of a family may bear the same name, may share the same blood, may sit and eat at the same table, and yet may have no more vital union than a handful of marbles in a boy's pocket. But let the spirit of a common love dwell in all their hearts and there is a family bound together in glorious union.

And so it is in the spirit, and there alone, that vital union is to be found. And here is the secret of such spiritual union. "By one spirit are we all baptized into one body." The Spirit of God, dwelling in all our spirits, attunes them into glorious harmony. Our lives blend with one another in the very music of the spheres. The mechanical becomes the vital, the artificial becomes the natural: we are "one in Christ Jesus."

WEDNESDAY, May 7. I Corinthians 12: 20-31. God's glory is expressed through the harmony of variety. We do not need sameness in order to gain union. I am now looking upon a scene of surpassing loveliness. There are mountains, and sea, and grassland, and trees, and a wide-stretching sky, and white pebbles at my feet. And a white bird has just flown across a little bank of dark cloud. What variety! And when I look closer the variety is infinitely multiplied. Everything blends into everything else. Nothing is out of place. Everything contributes to finished power and loveliness. And so it is in the grander sphere of human life.

And thus we have need of one another. Every note in the organ is needed for the full expression of noble harmony. Every instrument in the orchestra is required unless the music is to be lame and broken. Sir Michael Costa was once conducting an orchestra in London. One of the instrumentalists, playing a piccolo, was suddenly impressed with his own unimportance as a minor contributor to the mighty volume of harmonious sound. So he stayed his fingers and the piccolo was silent. Immediately Sir Michael raised his hand and cried, "Stop! Where's the piccolo!" Every other instrument in the orchestra was incomplete without the co-operation of the piccolo!

God has endowed no two souls alike, and every soul is needed to make the music of "the realm of the blest."

THURSDAY, May 8. John 16: 7-14. "He will guide you." How great is the difference between a guidepost and a guide! And what a difference between a guidebook and a companion! Mere instructions may be very uninspiring, and bare commandments may be very cold. Our Guide is an inseparable Friend.

And how will he guide us? He will give us insight. "He will guide you into all truth." He will refine our spirits so that we may be able to distinguish "things that differ," and that so we may know the difference between "the holy and the profane." Our moral judgment is often dull and imperceptive. And our spiritual judgment is often lacking in vigor and penetration. And so our great Spirit-Guide puts our spirits to school, and more deeply sanctifies them, that in holiness we may have discernment.

And he will also give us foresight. He will enable us to interpret circumstances, to apprehend their drift and destiny. We shall see harvests while we are looking at seeds. Every crisis will bring its revelation: we shall have "the light of life."

FRIDAY, May 9. I Corinthians 2: 7-12. "The deep things of God" cannot be discovered by the unaided reason. "Eye hath not seen": they are not to be apprehended by the artistic vision. "Ear hath not heard": they are not unveiled amid the discussion of the philosophic schools. "Neither hath entered into the heart of man": even poetic insight cannot discern them. All the common lights fail in this realm. We need another illumination, even that provided by the Holy Spirit. And the Spirit is offered unto us "that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God."

And here we have the reason why so many uncultured people are spiritually wiser than many who are learned. They lack talent but they have grace. They lack accomplishments, but they have the Holy Ghost. They are not scholars, but they are saints. They may not be theologians, but they have true religion. And so they have "the open vision." They "walk with God," and "the deep things of God" are made known to their souls.

We must put first things first. We may be busy polishing our lenses when our primary and fundamental need is light. It is not a gift that we require, but a Friend who will shed his holy light upon the secret place. He is the Spirit of revelation. He draws aside the veils, and he unfolds to us all that we need to know as we make our way home to God.

SATURDAY, May 10. Galatians 5: 16-25. Two friends were cycling through Worcestershire and Warwickshire to Birmingham. When they arrived in Birmingham I asked them, among other things, if they had seen Warwick jail along the road. "No," they said, "we hadn't a glimpse of it!" "But it is only a field's length from the road!" "Well, we never saw it!" Ah, but these two friends were lovers! They were so absorbed in each other that they had no spare attention for Warwick jail!

"Walk in the Spirit, and ye shall not fulfil the lusts of the flesh." That great Companionship will make us negligent of carnal allurements. "The world, and the flesh, and the devil" may stand by the wayside and hold their glittering wares before us, but we shall scarcely be aware of their presence.

This is the only real and effective way to meet temptation. We must meet it with an occupied heart. We must have no loose and trailing affections. We must have no vagrant, wayward thoughts. Temptation must find us engaged with our Lover. We must "offer no occasion to the flesh." Walking with the Holy One our souls are clean above the meannesses and the vulgarities which are pregnant with destruction. Our safety is in our elevation. "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high because he hath known my name."

A GREAT SUNDAY SCHOOL CONTEST

ATLANTA, GA., is setting a pace just now in Bible school development. The Bible school of the largest and wealthiest Baptist Church in the South and the second largest Bible school in the Christian denomination have put each other on their mettle. A challenge from the First Christian Bible School to the Second Baptist Bible School was accepted by the latter, and the contest began on February 16. It seemed to be concerned solely with improving the attendance of the two schools engaged, but before it progressed beyond the second Sunday it had aroused among scholars and teachers a rare enthusiasm that proved contagious. The contagion spread to other Bible schools of Atlanta, increasing their attendance by 30 per cent. according to estimates accepted by the Atlanta Evangelical Ministers' Association. It also spread to the churches and resulted in a notable increase in attendance.

Each of the two Bible schools had outgrown its quarters before the contest was half fought. Bible class No. 2 of the Baptist school rarely had as many as 85 in attendance before the contest began. On April 6, 186 enrolled members were crowded within its assigned quarters, and 45 others could not secure admission. The Bible class of Judge John T. Pendleton, of the Superior Court bench, in the same school, usually had an attendance of 45 or 50. On April 6 it had 125 in attendance. No others could find room in it. On the other hand, the infant enrolment grew so rapidly in the Christian school that additional chairs ordered from a North Carolina furniture factory could not be made in time, and an elder and two deacons of the congregation had to construct benches with their own hands.

Then the Christian school established a practice of having each session opened or closed by some notable church worker from other denominations. On Easter Sunday the governor-elect of Georgia, John M. Slaton, addressed the school. He is a member of Trinity Methodist Sunday school and teacher of a young ladies' Bible class there. But the Baptists were not to be outdone. Governor Joseph M. Brown of Georgia is a member of their church. He was engaged to address the Second Baptist school on April 13, and the largest attendance on the records of that school was expected to meet him. Also, Justice Beverly D. Evans of the Georgia Supreme Court on that same Sunday organized his class of "knee-breeches" boys. The justice had been stirred to enthusiastic participation by the work within his church.

Before the contest began, the average Bible school attendance of the First Christian Church was stated to have been 368 during the preceding twelve Sundays. That of the Second Baptist Church was stated as 411 for the same period. The Baptists gave the Christians a handicap of 2,210 points, and the contest began on February 16. The following tabulation shows graphically the results that followed:

	First Christian		Second Baptist
	Attendance	Points	Attendance	Points
February 16	769	2,478	449	991
February 23	979	3,588	750	2,282
March 2	971	3,042	789	2,561
March 9	985	3,187	902	3,230
March 16	1,135	3,361	805	2,249
March 23	1,215	4,041	1,110	3,591
March 30	1,057	3,038	797	2,510
April 6	1,133	3,570	1,095	3,791

On April 6 the First Christian had 151 new scholars, and the Second Baptist had 209 new scholars, giving the latter the greater number of points for that day. On April 12 the score stood with the Christian school 7,755 points ahead of its competitor. In scoring points, for every enrolled scholar present in his class at 9.30 o'clock Sunday morning, when school begins, two points are reckoned; for every tardy enrolled scholar present at 9.50 o'clock, one point; for each new scholar, five points; for each scholar attending church service and present in school the following Sunday to report it, one point each for morning and evening service. Ten points are to be scored when 75 per cent. of the scholars in attendance bring their Bibles from home, but neither contestant had scored this on April 12. The absence of a teacher from the regular weekly meeting of teachers in each church involved a penalty of two points against the teacher's school. Each Monday afternoon the commanders of the opposing forces confer and exchange helpful new ideas.

The idea of the contest was adapted from that which has built up the enrolment of the Christian Bible school in Canton, Ohio, to over 4,000 scholars, with an attendance said to be rarely less than 2,000, from a start with 140 enrolment about two years ago. The Canton school is said to be the largest Bible school among all denominations. It has been engaged constantly in one contest after another for some time past, but unvaryingly with churches of its own denomination. The Atlanta churches have originated the first interdenominational Bible school contest. The contest closes on May 4. Its conclusion will be celebrated by the rival schools at a joint meeting in Atlanta's big public auditorium. The pastors, Rev. Dr. John E. White of the Second Baptist, and Rev. Dr. L. O. Bricker of the First Christian; the superintendents, John S. Spalding (Second Baptist) and C. V. LeCraw (First Christian) and others will address the gathering on behalf of victor and vanquished. W. DAYTON'S GRATITUDE FOR HELP

WE HAVE just received your paper of April 2, and see that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a relief train to our city. I just wanted to write and thank you and all of the other good people who have sent us food and supplies during our time of distress.

We live in the flood district of Dayton. The water came in our house—about three feet on the first floor; though in other parts of the city it came that high and higher on the second floors. But we are so glad that it came no higher, and during the flood we played Pollyanna, and kept being glad it was no worse and that we had taken some food and water with us when the flood forced us to go upstairs. And when the waters went away and we came down and saw that all of our things were ruined, we just said how glad we were that it was no worse and that we were all alive!

Of course this is just our own experience; but many of our friends were taken out of their second story windows into boats and some had no food or water for days. I must close now, thanking you again for the help sent to the suffering people of our city. We should like all of the people who sent us help to know how much we thank them. We would do the same for them if they were in our place.

MISS ARENA CLASZ.

Dayton, Ohio.

Regarding Advertising

ADVERTISING has changed greatly since the first issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was printed. Through the persistent efforts of men in the advertising profession, the greater part of present-day advertising has become news. No responsible editor of a newspaper deliberately plans to print inaccurate news, and no sensible merchant attempts to deceive the people whom he wants to interest in his business. New-Skin Kills Germs!

Disease microbes are everywhere. They are apt to get into cuts. New-Skin kills them. Scientific tests prove it. Keep New-Skin on hand for emergencies.

The above plates show the result of a test made by one of the most prominent laboratories in the country. "A" is a photograph of pus-producing germs growing naturally, millions of them. "B" shows a similar surface with New-Skin applied over the upper part. No live germs could be found under the New-Skin or for half an inch around it. A copy of the original report sent free.

New-Skin is for cuts, scrapes and little injuries to the skin. It is a liquid that dries and forms a skin-like coating over the cut, transparent, flexible and adhering so firmly that it won't wash off with soap and water.

There is only one New-Skin.
Don't be imposed upon.
Nothing else is "the same thing."

New-Skin has been in successful use many years. Sold all over the world. See directions and circular. 200 uses.

Extra Gowns and Hats With Diamond Dyes

Why not have some extra gowns and hats this spring? The styles this season are so simple that you can easily make any of them at home.

This charmeuse dress you wore last spring can easily be made into a gown just as pretty. Dye the material one of the new spring shades.

Cut down the brim of one of your old summer hats—use some of the silk in the dress and a bunch of flowers for the trimming.

This Gown on the Right

Take your last summer voile dress—dye it a delicate lavender shade and trim it with buttons covered with material like the gown. For a hat to match use any straw, face it with black velvet, and dye a yard of satin ribbon lavender for the trimming.

Mrs. R. L. Lee, of Boston, writes:

"I often wonder why my friends don't have more gowns. Few dresses are really worn out and they can always be made over and given new life and beauty with Diamond Dyes.

"With the aid of Diamond Dyes I have many extra gowns, waists, hats, collars, etc."

Cream Charmeuse dyed Light Green

You, too, can solve dress problems with Diamond Dyes. You need not hesitate to dye your most costly garments. There is no knack or secret about using Diamond Dyes. They are as easy to use as soap.

Diamond Dyes

There are two classes of Diamond Dyes—one for Wool or Silk, the other for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods. Diamond Dyes for Wool or Silk come in Blue envelopes. Diamond Dyes for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods come in White envelopes.

Here's the Truth About Dyes for Home Use

Our experience of over thirty years has proven that no one dye will successfully color every fabric.

There are two classes of fabric: animal fibre fabrics, and vegetable fibre fabrics. Wool and Silk are animal fibre fabrics. Cotton and Linen are vegetable fibre fabrics. "Union" or "Mixed" goods are 60% to 80% Cotton—so must be treated as vegetable fibre fabrics.

Vegetable fibres require one class of dye, and animal fibres another and a radically different class of dye. As proof—we call attention to the fact that manufacturers of woolen goods use one class of dye, while manufacturers of cotton use an entirely different class of dye.

White Voile dyed Lavender

Do Not Be Deceived

For these reasons we manufacture one class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods, and another class of Diamond Dyes for coloring Wool or Silk, so that you may obtain the very best results on EVERY fabric.

REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Cotton, Linen or Mixed Goods use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Cotton, Linen, or Mixed Goods.

AND REMEMBER: To get the best possible results in coloring Wool or Silk use the Diamond Dyes manufactured especially for Wool or Silk.

CLEAR OUT THE DEADLY HOUSEFLY

NOW is the time to begin a warfare on the dangerous pests which carry filth and disease into our homes, threatening the lives of our loved ones and causing us all kinds of discomforts throughout the hot days of the summer. By killing one fly now we can save ourselves the trouble of contending against an army several millions strong a few weeks hence. Prevention is always better than cure. If we do not allow the flies to come into existence we shall have no occasion to grapple with the nuisance and menace to life they become when brought to full maturity by the heat of the summer sun.

Take into consideration that the first female fly creeping out of the nooks and crevices or from among the cobwebs of the barn, after the winter's nap, may be the mother of myriads during the season, the progenitress of an army which, of allowed to go unchecked, might have the possibility within it to destroy the whole human race. A fly lays about 120 eggs, and these in twelve hours hatch into a second generation which are able to propagate the species within twenty-four hours. From this it will be seen that a single fly within the space of a couple of days can produce 14,400 of its kind. The increase goes on in a multiple progression until millions of descendants result from a common parent in the course of a single month. Did not the laws of nature in some measure counteract the production by a proportional destruction, and did not man make efforts to free himself of the pests, in a single summer they would cover almost the whole of the habitable earth as did the plague of locusts the soil of Egypt.

The power of a single fly in itself to do harm is incalculable. It is capable of transmitting disease to an entire nation. On its viscous body and legs it can carry almost 2,000,000 bacteria, each of which may be a poisonous germ, a tiny messenger of death, which the innocent and ignorant never suspect. In fact, a single fly has the possibility within itself to kill more people than fell in all the wars recorded in history. Nine-tenths of the typhoid fever victims go down to their graves murdered by flies. Of all the deaths from all causes which occur in our cities and large towns, fully one-fifth are attributable to the agency of this minute and ubiquitous scourge. Diphtheria, scarlet fever, smallpox, cholera and leprosy are disseminated by means of the innocent looking little insects which we allow to buzz in and out of our doors in the pleasant days of summer. Unless they become particularly annoying and insist on exploring the length, breadth and area of the bald spots on our heads, we scarcely give them a thought, and even then we only "shoo" them off for the time being, never for a moment taking into consideration the fact that they may be depositing the seeds of disease in our systems. This carelessness, this want of thought generally costs us dearly. That fly which you watch creeping along the ceiling as you sit in your easy chair too indolent to get up and swat it, may cost you hundreds of dollars in doctors' bills. That other one running around the edges of the plates on the dresser, which you do not exert yourself to destroy, may fall into baby's milk in the morning and poison the darling on whom your affections are settled. That one which you now see on the window pane, twisting its filthy legs, and soiling the glass, may be weaving your own winding-sheet and digging your own grave. But you do not care! You refuse to arouse yourself to kill the fly, to declare extermination against it, to take steps to banish it and keep it away from your dwelling and from your children, those whom you love and whom you desire to protect.

For the sake of your own health and comfort, for the sake of the health and comfort of your family, and for the sake of the common welfare, will you not arouse yourself a little to the dangers of this insidious insect and do something to help to exterminate it from all civilized communities? You will not have to do anything extraordinary. It is easy to exterminate the fly if the proper steps be taken; no elaborate or expensive means are necessary.

In the first place, kill all the flies you possibly can; when you see one, swat it; the act may prevent millions from coming into life. But besides killing off the few, there are other means of preventing the many from coming into existence. These means consist in observing the laws of hygiene and enforcing cleanliness everywhere in your surroundings. Cleanliness is a deadly foe to the fly; it cannot exist, in fact, cannot come into being, in any place that is kept clean. The fly is engendered in filth, and dirt is its natural habitat. It cannot have life or live where there is no filth. Manure heaps, garbage pails, piles of rotten and fetid stuff, decaying vegetable matter, drains, sewers, sinks, receptacles for refuse, and all places where there is decay, rottenness and contamination are the breeding places of flies. Think of this when you see a fly crawling over the soft, pure skin of your baby's face; think of from whence it may have come, and shudder at the danger of its presence.

To eliminate the fly cleanliness is absolutely necessary. Cover all garbage cans and private closets and attend well to the stables, for it is just in these places that most of the flies are bred. Remove excrement and stable bedding to the manure heap once a day and put in a fresh supply. Sprinkle kerosene or petroleum on the manure and do not have the heap where the sun's rays can strike it. Let it be in the shade. Use chloride of lime freely around the farmyard and tidy up at the end of each day, carrying all offal and refuse to the common heap. By attending to such details and enforcing cleanliness in all departments you will be doing your share to exterminate the loathsome fly and to promote the health and happiness of the nation.

E YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

T ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

ove Not the World*

E ARE apt to blame and misjudge God for the requirements he makes of us, forgetting that in every case a s us to choose the thing that will n t precious, most delightful and s asting. The reason that he asks n to love the world is because the e f the world will keep us from i things that will bring us e r delight and because, in loving o orld, we are loving something r which we must very soon be r way.

W at does the command mean? n things in the world God himself si s and urges us to love. He r us to love and to enjoy life; he r us to love our friends; he wants t love our neighbors; he wants l e the beauties of nature, even as s nly Son loved the lilies of the l and liked to think about and t the birds of the air; he wants t love music and the other arts for h he gives the men and women of n s their skill. But there are cer- i things in the world he does not a us to love.

V get the best idea of what these hi s are that we must not love by o aring what the world stands for it what Christ and his church stand or by comparing the spirit of the o l with the spirit of Christ. The pi of the world is essentially g ly. It is natural for men, and v for women and children, to want t ave their own way, to want to b g pleasure to themselves even if h pleasure brings discomfort and a to others. The spirit of Christ s t greed, but love, a love that will e his followers to bear hardship a pain that others may be helped a made glad. What we are to hate, h , is that spirit of the world which m ifests itself in the selfish, proud, n dy, lustful acts of the people of h world.

A great many of the problems about v dliness which confront young C istians can be settled quite easily f e insist on reducing them thus to h r lowest terms of greed or kind- n . It is often true that a thing w h seems quite harmless in itself is p of a whole system or world of ac- i which is essentially greedy and s l. The amusements in which we n r indulge, the places of entertain- m t to which we may go, the songs w may sing, the books we may read, a of these may have some subtle c nection with the forces of evil w h are wrecking countless lives. E young Christian should never be- c e morbid or suspicious. He is to b cheery, wholesome, optimistic, en- t siastic. He is to have his fun and e njoy to the utmost the companion- p of his frien ls and associates. B he should be quick to detect that e eful spirit of cruel greed which c ld lead him first to simple self-in- d gence, then to over-indulgences, t n to reckless, heartless, cruel pur- s t of gratification.

A few simple rules have long been k own among the circles of Christ's f lowers which will serve as guides t the earnest soul who is in perplex- a about any course of action. The f st is: "What would Jesus do?" We k ow that Christ was a vigorous, hu- m n young man as well as a divine p rson. He entered heartily into the c mpanionships and pleasures of life. P ul, one of his immediate followers, k owed a perfect familiarity with the c hletic games and contests of his day, a plying that he considered them w holesome.

The young Christian may take part in any innocent, healthful amusement, b t it should not be impossible for him to think of his Master as doing any of the things which he is allowing to himself. He must not do anything which weakens his mind or body. He is to keep himself in training for the best service in the name of Christ, just as an athlete or a soldier keeps himself in trim for his tasks. Another rule is: "What influence will this act of mine have upon my neighbor who sees me? May he be led by this act which to me is innocent to go farther than I have gone and so fall into condemnation?" Another: "What does the Book say?" For many of these modern questions we can find definite answers in the old Book if we will search for them eagerly. Lastly, but of even as great importance as the first, "How does this act or habit affect my personal communion with the Master? Does it make him seem farther away? Is it difficult to begin to talk with him immediately after I have been doing this thing? Does it make me feel less comfort in the thought of his presence?" It is thus, often, that the "earth-born clouds arise," which "hide us from our Master's eyes."

The Son of God*

AMONG all the sources of proofs of the deity of Jesus two are of special importance and unanswerable power. The first is the record of the things that he is actually doing now and has been doing for almost two thousand years for the souls and bodies of men. He still has power to forgive sins and bring new life to the soul, new health to the body. We do not need to go back to the first century and to Palestine to witness his mighty works. Every day in New York, in Chicago, in San Francisco, in Yokohama, in Madras, in Vienna, in London, men and women are finding Christ and proving that he has power to renew their souls and bring them hope and joy. Nobody but a God can do things like this.

The other source of proof is the record of the things Jesus said and thought about himself. He was altogether too wise to be mistaken; he was altogether too good to lie. If we take him at all we must take him for what he is; and he is what he said he was—the incarnation of God.

Of the long list of references given for our study this week two are of special weight. One is the Master's answer to Philip's request: "Lord, show us the Father." Nothing could be more startlingly clear and plain than his reply: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (John 14: 9). He had said the same thing to the Jews (John 12: 45): "He that seeth me seeth Him that sent me."

This Christ we love and serve is the Eternal God. How nobly should we live, then, in his name, who has called us into his service and his friendship!

Young People's Question Box

Mrs. M. L. E., Krebo, Okla. I have just finished "Concerning My Neighbor" in "The Young People's Meeting," and note your explanation. Please tell me if this explanation means the negro. Does it mean that one is to do all one can to help the negro in Jesus' name? If so, why not distinguish such work as other work is distinguished?

"Our neighbor" unquestionably includes the negro. Different people have different ways of fulfilling this duty, but all must agree that every Christian should do what he can to help the negro as much as the members of any other race. Some are called to do special work for the members of that race, but every Christian is called upon to treat them with unselfish kindness. A numher of the denominations have special boards and officers for work among negroes. Other churches, organizations, and religious papers make no definite distinction between their work for whites and blacks, but try to make their influence and gifts reach as far as possible to all alike.

There is New Strength and Vitality for you in Sanatogen

WHEN practicing physicians, to the number of over 17,000, state over their own signatures their belief in the health-promoting action of Sanatogen; when grateful users of Sanatogen everywhere sing the praises of Sanatogen; when leading medical journals record the good effects of Sanatogen—you surely cannot doubt that Sanatogen will bring new strength and vitality to you.

For many years, physicians in many countries have watched the true upbuilding, fortifying action of Sanatogen. They have seen how it infuses new strength and endurance into a starved nervous system; how it regenerates blood and tissue, bringing fresh vigor to the weak and anemic; how wonderfully it improves digestion, helping other foods to feed and nourish.

And those who actually use Sanatogen know that these effects are real, natural and lasting—they know that Sanatogen does not act as a spur or stimulant, but as a true food and tonic which feeds and fortifies—naturally and persistently—not whipping or spurring nature, but faithfully assisting her in winning back that glorious possession, Health and Strength.

The Right Rev. the Bishop of Southampton writes:
"It gives me pleasure to bear my testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative. It is undoubtedly beneficial."

The Right Rev. the Bishop of Lucknow
writes:
"Whenever I have considered it necessary to take a tonic I have used Sanatogen with marvelous results."

Mme. Sarah Grand
Author of "The Heavenly Twins," writes:

FAITHFULNESS CROWNED*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

JOSEPH'S life is but one of many crownings of lowly faithfulness. There is no path in the field of biography so well worn as the path of faithfulness leading from lowly birth to esteemed usefulness. Time would fail us to tell of the multitudes lowly of birth who through diligent faithfulness have come to "stand before kings" as did Joseph, the shepherd boy, and Franklin, the printer boy, and Whitelaw Reid, the farmer boy. For rich and poor alike, daily faithfulness is the path to power and honor. Sometimes the crowning of faithfulness does not come till after death; but the faithful are sure of a crown in heaven, and they usually get it on earth also—in history, if not in their lifetime. In history's hall of fame we miss many who won a crown of political or commercial or social success at any cost, and find there the martyrs, prophets, saviors who dared to fail for a time in order to succeed forever.

The man who wins is an average man;
Not built on any peculiar plan,
Not blest with any peculiar luck;
Just steady and earnest and full of pluck.

For the man who wins is the man who works,
Who neither labor nor trouble shirks,
Who uses his hands, his head, his eyes:
The man who wins is the man who tries.

CHARLES R. BARRETT.

JOSEPH INTERPRETING PHARAOH'S DREAM

From the painting by Harold Speed

One quality that made Joseph successful was humility. When he went before Pharaoh to interpret his dreams he took no credit to himself, but said in the humility that usually goes with true greatness, "It is not in me; God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." It is no mock humility that makes really great men recognize their own limitations. With Sir Isaac Newton, they see before them a great ocean of truth, only in small part explored, and themselves as children picking up pebbles on its shores or wading into its shallows. Their own humility makes room for God to fill them with his own wisdom and power. "Less of self, and more of Thee."

Another quality in Joseph that conduces to success wherever found was daily faithfulness. Though he worked as a slave without wages in Potiphar's home, he worked faithfully and was soon promoted to be head servant. Similar faithfulness in his prison labor brought like reward. He got so in the habit of becoming head servant that when he got a chance he became head servant of Egypt's king—the premier in what was then the world's foremost empire. The best expression of religion is daily faithfulness in our common tasks. "You may naturally be a very smart person; you may be so gifted that you can do almost anything, but with all that, you will lack perfection if you do not do it with all your heart and strength."

For boys of high school age about the best test of character is faithfulness in athletics as a basis of individual and group successes rather than professionalism or trickery. Colonel Roosevelt, in a message to the boys and girls of Washington, said: "I hope that whenever you enter a contest you will do all that is in you to win, and yet that you will remember that it is far better to fail than to win by any unfairness, by any underhand trickery."

The chief quality in Joseph that insured his success was his Christlikeness. Whether his life was providentially shaped to be a type of Christ we can not say, but the analogies are many. Like Jesus, Joseph was the favorite son who was sent by his father to his brethren, but when he came unto his own, they received him not, but sold him. Joseph too resisted temptation, forgave his enemies, was "numbered with transgressors" and finally crowned. His life, like Christ's, was forecast, and he too fulfilled glorious prophecy.

"God has a plan for every man," and by Christlike thinking and living we shall fulfil that plan to his glory and ours.

With this lesson of Joseph's elevation, it is fitting that the increasing men's classes of our Sunday schools should at least give some thought to the new officers that in city, State and nation have recently entered on their duties. In the opening prayer of every Sunday school divine guidance should be asked for the President and all other public officials. And it would be fitting to read to-day, if it has not been read before, some extracts from the prophet-like call to social justice in President Wilson's inaugural:

"Nowhere else in the world have noble men and women exhibited in more striking forms the beauty and the energy of sympathy and helpfulness and counsel in their efforts to rectify wrong, alleviate suffering, and set the weak in the way of strength and hope. We have built up, moreover, a

—LETTERS have come to the Round Table from CHRISTIAN HERALD readers on both sides of the graded lesson question. Mr. John J. Barret, of Louisville, Ky., gives an additional reason for holding to the uniform lessons in a suggestive letter which is worth quoting entire:

"Your position on the question of graded lessons in Sunday school is in accordance with my views. I am superintendent of a country Sunday school, and there was no attempt made some time ago to have them introduced. I knew nothing then about the system, and its advocate succeeded in having the first three years of the system introduced. This proved very expensive, but the main trouble was encountered when the regular teacher was absent. We have a limited number of teachers, and when the regular teacher was not on hand the class would be untaught. I believe the Uniform Lesson can be taught to children of any grade if the teacher makes proper preparation. In proof of this, I have seen a chapter from one of the minor prophets taught to a class of young negro children by a teacher who held their attention and interest from beginning to end. If this can be done with this kind of a class, any other passage can be taught with the same result."

—IN DEFENSE of the graded lessons we have received a letter from E. J. Burgess, of Emsworth, Pa., who assumes that our criticism of the graded lessons—which we referred to in one instance as the "new methods"—implies criticism of normal classes, home departments, and cradle rolls. He assumes that these go with the graded lessons, whereas they are used quite as much with the uniform lesson, and so we have no conflict with his claim that those who are using such new methods are bringing the largest number of new members into the churches. Of course, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Round Table stands for all new methods that are really improvements, and most of those things which are supposed to be essential to the graded lesson might really be applied just as well to the uniform series. Mr. Blakeslee, who started the new movement, would have made a uniform series increasingly effective by the admirable way in which he teaches any lesson which he handles. This correspondent, speaking of the new methods as special defense of the graded lessons, mentions the great parade of twenty-seven thousand men in Philadelphia, with banners and bands, and of other forward movements in the Pennsylvania Sunday School Association, which I am sure are not more due to the graded lessons in Pennsylvania than to the uniform series. He also argues that Christ taught with birds and flowers and grain and seed and soil for illustrations, but here again we find an illustration of the common mistake of assuming that these fresh methods of teaching can not be applied to the uniform lesson as well as to the graded series.

—IN A PREVIOUS Round Table the question was asked about how to amuse and entertain Sunday school scholars at social gatherings. Miss Alice Finley, of Grand Rapids, writes that she has found card games of Bible characters an excellent way. These cards are quite similar to the "game of authors" in vogue some years ago. One thing to be said in their favor is that they both amuse and give instruction.

—INQUIRY IS MADE where small Bible picture lesson cards may be had, and what they cost.

The price is five cents per quarter, and they may be ordered through any bookstore where Sunday school helps are kept. These cards are liked by the children, and are well calculated to create a home interest in the Sunday school.

training, however, was too perfect to let him fail to accept a duty with courtesy and attention. He answered his father promptly, and noted the details of the errand.

The day's delivering was finished in a fever of haste. He must—no matter what came—he must see Phebe once more. His heart cried out with bitterness at thought of the cruel wound to be dealt that tender heart. He felt again the clinging touch of soft hands, and the pressure of a head against his arm, as the girl uttered that heart-cry: "I love you, Abner!"

The groan of Abner's spirit, as he thought of these things, trembled upon his lips. But he must see her! That could not be wrong. See her—hold her in his arms—and one more kiss!

Without stopping to consult the Inward Light, as one is supposed to do at such crucial moments, Abner found an excuse for going earlier to his train, and turned his steps toward the home of his beloved.

When he reached the large, square, old-fashioned frame house, half buried in palms and magnolias, under which Phebe had grown up like a violet, the boy found the shades drawn, and not a visible sign of life. He suddenly recalled, with a sense of sickening defeat, that the girl had said something last night about her mother having made some shopping plans for the day. Dumb with misery, he stumbled blindly down the steps.

As he was walking toward the corner from which his car would start, a hand fell upon his shoulder, and Matthew Coffin's voice was in his ear.

"What has thee on thy mind that weights thy head so heavily, Abner Evans?" asked the old man.

Abner's bloodshot eyes searched Matthew's face. With the sense of one drowning and grasping at the ripples on the waves, the boy drew his old friend into the shelter of a doorway.

"Mr. Coffin," he gasped, hoarsely, "I—I've had a message—the Inward Light—oh, wait, Mr. Coffin!" The man had grasped the boy's hands. "Mother says it is better not to tell; but I think it's better to tell than to go crazy, as I surely will if I don't talk to somebody."

"Thee may tell me, Abner Evans," said Matthew gravely and gently. "I will interpose no doubts, and I've known thee since thee was an infant. What is it troubles thee?"

"Mr. Coffin, it came yesterday afternoon, and it says I must—must not marry Phebe."

Matthew's wrinkled face was puckered with dismay and sympathy. "Art sure, my boy? Was it—"

"Oh, sure—sure enough! There was no doubt—"

"Tell me how it seemed to thee exactly!"

Abner related the experience, and the message word for word. Matthew was puzzled, but his faith in the ancient guidance of his people warned him that he must not meddle with so evident a leading.

"Thee will find all for the best, my son," he counseled earnestly; "perhaps the way of peace for thee lies in the following of the command. I myself was guided to a union with Martha Coffin by the Light, and, while there was no such feverish romance as I fear existed between thee and Phebe Dole, yet she and I have led a life of peaceful union in the Lord. Have faith, my son."

With a groan the boy turned away. He had a dreary, nauseating vision of himself in a Quaker coat, walking solemnly and decorously, through endless decades, into the meeting-house on First-day, with a thin woman in a gray bonnet and shawl. He even saw himself followed by assorted sizes of dismal looking children—he suddenly hated those children, who had not Phebe's eyes.

A thought struck him. "Mr. Coffin, won't you give a message to Phebe?" he said eagerly, as his car reached its starting-place and stopped, waiting.

Matthew gladly assented, for the boy's white face went to his heart.

"Tell her," panted Abner, "about this—and tell her—oh, tell her that I must always love her—always! It can never be different. Tell her that life is death to me without her—oh—"

But Matthew Coffin, with a shocked shudder, notwithstanding the world of sympathy in his face, seized the boy's arm, and drew him toward the car.

"Thee must trust, boy! Thee is rebellious, and that can only lead to evil. Thee must—rejoice."

Matthew spoke the last word rather weakly, for Abner, casting a glance of indignant reproach toward his friend, sprang desperately up the steps of the moving car.

In Pasadena, First-day morning dawned in darkness. Abner, creeping from a sleepless pillow—which he had sought at an hotel, fleeing the gentle curiosity of friendly eyes — looked through his windows into a floating fog which had the blueness of steel. In the east he saw the sun, a disc of dull white, set flat in a space of solid gray, and framed by the outlines of two shadowy, giant eucalyptus trees. At ten o'clock, however, as he left the hotel and turned into North Euclid Avenue, the sun had conquered. The air was like the moist kiss of an infant. The calla lilies were freshened and purified by the fog, and the jeweled roses glistened under the sun's welcome beams.

Abner, from babyhood, had loved the smell of the earth. But now his wan glance shrank from the beauty about him; even the sweet twitters of the mockingbirds jarred upon his ear. His face felt drawn to lines of age from his nights of misery, and his slender figure seemed to have thinned in the hours of suffering through which he had passed.

Religious duty, however, surged in the blood, and the boy was determined to face whatever came to him in quite the same spirit with which an honored ancestress of his had faced death on Boston Common.

The meeting-house at Pasadena, a plain, shapeless, shabby structure, stands in sharp contrast to the rioting beauty in which its unenticing existence is cast. As Abner passed toward it along the street, turning his head to avoid the stiffly waving palm-leaves, a number of gray-clad, sweet-faced women and sober-coated men were wending their way up the wooden steps of the Friends' meeting-house.

Abner saw none whom he knew—indeed he scarcely lifted his head to glance at the others—and within the building he took a place on one of the back seats of the men's side. During the silence that gradually fell, the boy sat in a revery which, later, took no heed of the voices when they broke the spell. A merciful numbness of the spirit was stealing upon him. Nature must, in self-defense, give to so tortured a brain either stupor or death. He did not look around the congregation while the meeting held, but presently he was aware of the soft passing of footsteps. The worshipers were leaving.

A swift pang shot through the lad's heart, and for the first time since his trouble a sudden cry went out from his soul for help in this time of need. As swiftly, like a healing balm, came the message that always answers the creature's call of distress, and the boy arose to his feet with an assurance of strength that he had not dreamed would be possible.

He looked freely about. Nearly all the people had left. Far down toward the front, on the women's side, he perceived that a figure in Quaker garb was still seated. Her head in its barrel-like bonnet was bowed upon the back of the bench in front of her.

Solved an Age-Old Problem in These Foods

These fascinating foods, Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice—we don't want to make them too scientific.

Eat them for sheer enjoyment.

Serve with cream and sugar. Mix with any fruit. Float in bowl of milk.

Use them like nut-meats in candy-making, or as garnish for ice cream.

These are thin, airy wafers. Each grain is puffed to eight times normal size.

Each has countless cells, surrounded by crisp, toasted walls. And those walls crush, at a touch of the teeth, into almond-flavored granules.

Eat them because wheat or rice in no other form was ever half so delicious.

That's what millions do.

But it's also pleasant to know that, in other ways, these are the most desirable foods men know. So let us briefly tell you the scientific side.

Puffed Wheat, 10c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

The Scientific Side

The age-old problem in cereal foods has been, how to break up the food granules.

That's essential to digestion.

Cooking, baking and toasting broke part of them. And for centuries that had to suffice. But the dream was to break all of them—to make whole-grain wholly digestible.

Prof. A. P. Anderson made that dream come true.

He does it by steam explosion—by some 125,000,000 explosions inside every kernel—one for every starch granule.

He does it by applying to the sealed-up grains 550 degrees of heat. Thus the trifle of moisture within each granule is turned to superheated steam.

Then comes the explosion, and every granule is literally blasted to pieces. Yet the coats of the grain are unbroken.

Think of this when you eat them. By no other process can these great cereals be made anywhere near so digestible.

That means you get all the nutrition. And they do not tax the stomach.

For a supper dish—for a bed-time dish—think what it means to have such crisp, brown wafers to serve in bowls of milk.

And the taste is like toasted nuts.

Abner watched as the others passed silently into the outer air. At last there remained but himself and the bowed, Quaker-clad figure. As he stepped slowly but firmly down the aisle, his feet instinctively took a measured tread, and he carried himself with a new, stern dignity.

When he drew near to where the woman was sitting, he suddenly noticed that the shoulders under the gray shawl were heaving convulsively. Not before had it occurred to Abner that there might be two victims to the sacrifice. With a pang of pity and remorse, he forgot his own selfish woe, and registered a firm resolve upon his soul. If this were the one whom he had been sent to meet, naught but reverent kindness should she ever receive from him. He went nearer, and with gentle touch laid his hand upon the woman's shoulder.

She started, and Abner could perceive the gesture of fright and horror with which she raised her head.

"Have no fear!" he said with the utmost kindness. Involuntarily the "plain" speech sprang to his lips—"Has thee—has thee been sent—"

He stopped, for the woman was tugging frantically at the tangled bonnet-strings. The ribbons snapped under her nervous fingers. Snatching at the cape of the head-dress to pull it back, she faced Abner. Then a wild, trembling cry like that of a wounded lamb was followed by a flinging away of the bonnet, and an ecstatic throwing of a pair of soft arms about Abner's neck. The boy staggered back, then caught the gray figure to his breast.

"Phebe!"

"Oh, Abner—Abner! Oh"—the girl started, and turned her pale face fearfully about. "There is no—no man—you don't see any one else, Abner?"

"No one, Phebe! We are alone. Darling, darling, what does it mean?"

She clung to him like a child to its mother. "Oh, Abner! I've had the Light—and, dearest, it told me—told me—" She buried her face in his bosom.

Abner was speechless with an awful fear of his own joy.

Phebe lifted her head. "It was real, Abner—horribly real—though for a second I was filled with delight that the Voice should have spoken to me. The horror came afterwards. It told me to meet in this house—to meet the man whom I should love in the Lord."

Abner caught her closer in his arms. A sudden realization of heaven was revealed to him. "And the Lord bade me come to meet thee, my love, my tender dove!"

"But oh, Abner," — Phebe, still trembling with fear, kept her face close to her lover's heart lest even yet a horrible reality in a Quaker coat might materialize—"I have suffered so—but I knew I must obey. It was Friday afternoon the message came, and then—the way opened. My aunt here in Pasadena wrote that she had burned her hand, and wanted me to stay with her over First-day. Oh, what I've suffered! Abner! Oh, do you suppose—oh, did it mean that we—we were to meet?"

She lifted her lovely, tired eyes to her lover's smile, and the truth broke upon her. "Oh, blessed Light!" she sobbed. "Oh, most holy, loving Light! We are—we are to love each other!"

"Yes, darling." Abner's face sobered, and his voice was grave. "Yes, my precious one; always, now—always in the Lord."

Don't Try to Cheat Your Feet

Don't pare the corn a little and think the corn will go.

Don't daub it with liquids, or use an old-time pad or plaster.

That's fooling with a corn.

A famous chemist found a way to take out corns completely. Now we own his method.

We call it Blue-jay. It's a little plaster, applied in a jiffy. The moment you use it, all pain is stopped.

You forget the corn. In 48 hours take off the plaster and the corn comes out. Not a whit of the corn is left.

All this is done without any pain or soreness. Every month a million corns are now removed like this. Try it on one of yours.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B stops the pain and keeps the wax from spreading.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

THE CALL OF HOME

"When he came to himself he said . . . I will arise and go to my father."—Luke 15: 17, 18.

ARISE, O soul, no longer stay
In far-off country. Up! Away!
Behold thyself, thy substance spent,
In famine's fold with husks content.
List to the far-off cry of home
Which bids thee come; no longer roam
Where hunger reigns. Hast thou no care
That bounteous board with bread to spare
Awaits thy coming? Then arise,
Go meet the father's waiting eyes.
Come back! God calls to every heart:
He ne'er designed so mean a part
For you, his son, as feeding swine.
Wilt not return to feast and dine?
Unworthy? Deep contrition brings
The kiss of love, the robe of kings,
The ring of sonship. Why delay
Thy coming home another day?
O hungry heart; O sin-marred life;
O homesick soul, tired of the strife,
A father pleads: Wilt not come home
To peace and rest? Why longer roam?

Montrose, Pa. WM. D. B. AINEY.

A Revival in Honolulu

WHEN two earnest laymen come to your door, as they have lately done to Honolulu, having already traversed two-thirds of the world's circumference, giving their services freely, and with unabated ardor, and with a double measure of that compelling quality called magnetism, demand a hearing in the name of the Men and Religion Movement, crowds will come, and coming will hear, and attention being arrested, will discover that these evangelists bring a message of timely and imperative import. Messrs. Fred B. Smith of New York and Raymond Robins of Chicago have effected wonders in this cosmopolitan city of forty thousand inhabitants. Their ministrations have been to men only, with the exception of a Sunday morning sermon apiece to general congregations, and the same evening an address by Mr. Robins to twelve hundred women, under the auspices of the Young Women's Christian Association in the great Central Union Church. No one present will ever forget the solemn impression made by the speaker, who affirmed that the work done would not be permanent without the sympathy and co-operation of the Christian women of the place. He instanced with thrilling effect the heroic self-devotion of such women as Jane Addams and Agnes Nestor, who had "wrought mightily" and successfully.

While the women were listening to this appeal, two thousand men were gathered in one of the largest theaters, having an equally forcible presentation of the necessity for men to arouse themselves from the lethargy of unbelief and selfishness, and "come up to the help of the Lord." When the Gospel invitation was given, not by ones or twos did they respond, but hundreds pressed toward the altar, confessing their sins, and a determination to turn from them and lead a new life.

These evangelists have now gone to Japan to deliver the same message. Wherever they go they meet with an enthusiastic welcome. God speed their errand. M. S. S.

Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands.

HE GOT THE MEANING

I WAS at a friend's house the other evening. She has a small son, just beginning to talk, and as he was about to retire I had the pleasure of hearing him say the little prayer she had taught him. It was "Now I lay me——" The little fellow could not retain so many words, but he grasped the meaning nevertheless. This is as he said it: "Lay s'eep. Lord teep; olle wake, Lord tate." K. F. D.

De Meridor Medicinal Liquid Beauty Powder is safer and better than face powder. White, Pink and Flesh. 35 CENTS PER BOTTLE.

The De Meridor Company, Newburgh, N. Y.

THE NEW Hygeia NURSING BOTTLE

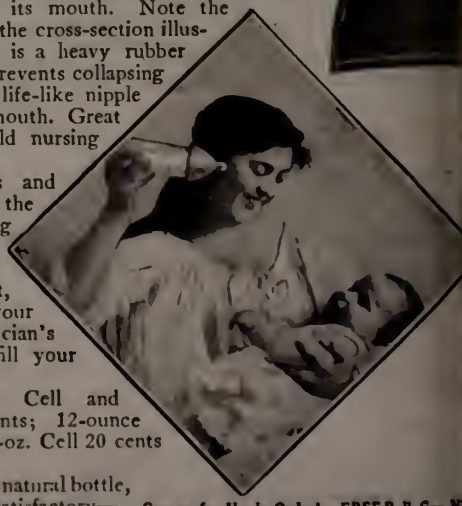
The bottle, which is really a cell, is quickly and easily cleaned. The Breast-Nipple is shaped like mother's breast. The baby feeds naturally and can not take any part of the breast in its mouth. Note the "Hidden Shield" in the cross-section illustration. This shield is a heavy rubber reinforcement, that prevents collapsing and permits only the life-like nipple to enter the infant's mouth. Great improvement over old nursing bottle.



Physicians, Nurses and Mothers recommend the New Hygeia Nursing Bottle. You can get it at your druggist's. If he doesn't sell it, write to us, giving your druggist's and physician's name and we will fill your order by mail.

Price of 8-ounce Cell and Breast-Nipple 35 cents; 12-ounce 45 cents. Separate 8-oz. Cell 20 cents each. Separate Breasts 15 cents each.

The New Hygeia is the better, more natural bottle, but, if you find the old-fashioned bottle satisfactory—

Half Section

This New Ball-Cup Nipple Mailed Free

Fits regular small neck bottles. The only nipple ever invented with a ball-cup and the puncture away from the baby's mouth—at the bottom of the cup, near the center of the nipple where it is protected from enlargement. Baby can feed only one cupful at a time. The Ball-Cup nipple is non-collapsible and insures regular feeding. Outlasts several ordinary nipples. We give you one free to try, without one cent of cost, if you use the coupon.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

great system of government, which has stood through a long age as in many respects a model for those who seek to set liberty upon foundations that will endure. But with riches has come inexcusable waste. We have been proud of our industrial achievements, but we have not hitherto stopped thoughtfully enough to count the human cost, the cost of lives snuffed out, of energies overtaxed and broken, the fearful physical and spiritual cost to the men and women and children upon whom the dead weight and burden of it all has fallen pitilessly the years through.

"The great government we loved has too often been made use of for private and selfish purposes, and those who used it had forgotten the people. We have come now to the sober second thought. The scales of heedlessness have fallen from our eyes. We have made up our minds to square every process of our national life again with the standards we so proudly set up at the beginning and have always carried at our hearts. The feelings with which we face this new age of right and opportunity sweep across our heartstrings like some air out of God's own presence, where justice and mercy are reconciled and the judge and the brother are one. This is not a day of triumph; it is a day of dedication. Here muster, not the forces of party, but the forces of humanity. Men's hearts wait upon us; men's lives hang in the balance; men's hopes call upon us to say what we will do. Who shall live up to the great trust? Who dares fail to try?"

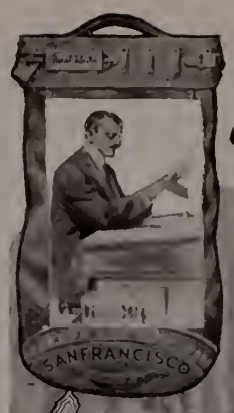
Among the Workers

—MR. RALPH A. WEISS, of 443 Goepp Street, Bethlehem, Pa., announces that he has some helpful tracts which he will mail without charge to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for free distribution.

—MISS IDA L. REED, of Philippi, W. Va., greatly appreciates the kindness of many friends who write to her expressing their enjoyment of her occasional contributions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She has been unwell, however, and finds herself unable to answer personally these welcome letters of appreciation.

—DR. AND MRS. E. C. CORT, who are conducting a school with 120 pupils and doing medical missionary work at Muang-Prae, Siam, report that they are confronting serious difficulties caused by the failure of three successive rice crops and an epidemic of smallpox. A part of the river bank on which the buildings are located has been washed away, making necessary the erection of buildings on a new compound. There is great poverty among the sick, and a number of them are being supported personally by these faithful workers.

—RELIGIOUS BODIES of all denominations have been invited to send delegates to the Fourth American Peace Congress to be held at St. Louis, May 1, 2 and 3. A committee on religious institutions has been created to plan for the participation of the churches in the great peace meeting, which will be attended by representatives of at least fifteen Latin-American countries, and which will be addressed by many international figures, including Mr. Andrew Carnegie, and possibly President Wilson, who has accepted the honorary presidency of the Congress. Many of the foremost churches of St. Louis will invite a Peace Congress delegate, not necessarily a clergyman, to be its guest Sunday, May 4, and speak on the subject of Peace. The addresses thus delivered will become a part of the literature of the Peace Congress. St. Louis has more than 400 churches, virtually all of which are expected to join in observing the day. The Committee on Religious Institutions has the co-operation of the Church Peace League of America, recently organized "to enlist the churches of America in the movement to induce the nations to substitute judicial methods for war in the settlement of international disputes; to establish a permanent world court of justice; to foster the spirit of justice and good-will among the nations; to hasten the realization of the brotherhood of man, and to seek that world unity which shall bring peace on earth." Rev. Frederick Lynch states that the Church Peace League was organized under the auspices of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America "with seventy-five charter members, comprehending some of the most distinguished clergymen and church officers of the whole nation." The hope is expressed by the Rev. Mr. Lynch that "before 1913 is completed we shall have enrolled in it the leading pastors of all denominations in the United States to the number of at least five thousand."



Interstate Insurance Solved by Postal Life

INSURANCE PROTECTION
POSTAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY
HEALTH CONSERVATION

Receives business from every State—direct

THERE are 252 legal reserve life-insurance companies in the country, all operating through agents, yet only 33 of these companies do business in the State of New York.

Similarly, of the largest four New York companies—"the giants" so-called—not one does business in Texas; two of them do not enter Wisconsin, and the fourth does no business in ten States.

The States will not let agents solicit business unless their companies take out licenses, pay so-called "occupation" taxes, and submit to other State exactions, which some companies can not, or will not, do.

The Postal Life, a New York company, complying with all the strict requirements of that State, is the only insurance institution that receives business from every State in the Union, thus enabling everyone to arrange insurance direct.

The POSTAL is, in quite a true sense, an interstate institution and it can transact an interstate business, because it is a non-agency company; it employs no agents and does not send them into the various States.

It is therefore exempt from the various expensive requirements applicable to companies employing agents and agencies. Postal policyholders get the benefit.

Pays claims in every State—promptly

THE one who wants insurance in the Postal Life writes, as a citizen of the United States, direct to the Company's New York headquarters shown above—its only place of business. The Postal answers by mail, and it is thus subject to the United States Postal authorities—also to the Federal Courts.

Uncle Sam brings letters from applicants, wherever they live, and takes the Company's answers wherever they are directed.

Insurance policies thus arranged for are valid and binding wherever policyholders may reside; policy-claims are paid by checks mailed direct to the beneficiaries—and promptly.

STRONG POSTAL POINTS

First: Old-line legal reserve insurance—not fraternal or assessment.

Second: Standard policy reserves, now $10,000,000. Insurance in force, $50,000,000.

Third: Standard policy provisions, approved by the State Insurance Department.

Fourth: Operates under strict State requirements and subject to the United States postal authorities.

Fifth: High medical standards in the selection of risks.

Sixth: Policyholders' Health Bureau provides one free medical examination each year, if desired.

See How Easy It Is

In writing simply say: Mail me insurance particulars for my age as per May CURRENT OPINION.

In your letter be sure to give:

1. Your Full Name.
2. Your Occupation.
3. The Exact Date of your Birth.

No agent will be sent to visit you: the Postal Life dispenses with agents and gives its policyholders the benefit of their commissions.

Net Cost Low in the POSTAL because

1st. Commission Dividends, corresponding to agents' commissions, less the moderate advertising charge, go to Postal Policyholders the first year.

2d. Renewal-Commission Dividends and Office-expense Savings, covered by the 3d. Contingent Policy dividends, based on the company's earnings, still further reduce the cost each year after the first.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

SURELY in the floods of great waters they shall not come nigh unto thee." Among the letters telling of answered prayer are some telling of experiences during the recent Ohio floods. They demonstrate again that prayer is a practical matter, applicable to the daily events of life, whether ordinary or extraordinary.

"I had some very dear friends in Dayton, Ohio, when the flood came: one married daughter, her husband and little child, and one unmarried daughter. They were in different parts of the city. News of the flood came to us on Wednesday, and for four days we heard nothing from them. I prayed for them, that they might be saved. I was hopeful most of the time. Saturday morning the sun shone bright and the birds in the trees were singing so sweetly and everything looked so cheerful I felt like singing myself. At ten o'clock my son called me on the telephone and said: 'I have a message from Dayton. They are all saved.' I said, 'Thank the Lord!' I don't see how people can live in this world of trouble without a Saviour to trust in!" This good letter comes from Mrs. F. O. of Thomasville, N. C. North Carolina seems a long way from Ohio, but the same Lord who was protecting the children in their danger was comforting and cheering the anxious mother far away.

A mother from Sarnia, Ontario, writes: "When THE CHRISTIAN HERALD comes, almost the first thing I turn to is the Answered Prayer Column. When the paper came last week I turned the pages eagerly, as I was feeling unusually downhearted and hoped to find some comfort there. As I turned, I noticed the words: 'If any of you lack wisdom,' and as I read a light seemed to dawn. I had been trusting my own judgment instead of asking God for wisdom to guide me when the way seemed so difficult." This friend goes on to ask a most interesting question: "Do you think it is wrong to ask for personal favors?" She illustrates by mentioning a simple pleasure for which she has long wished and which would seem, from her statements, not only to be richly deserved but to be one that would benefit as well as please her.

The answer to this question is really quite simple. When we want anything we might as well tell God about it as not, because he knows anyway. To the earnest Christian every desire is a prayer. That is the kind of a friend God is, so near, so alert, so tender, that not the slightest desire can enter our minds but he knows about it and would like to grant its fulfilment. We, on our part, should talk things over very frankly with him. Paul exhorts, "In everything, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known to God." Of course we must always tell him that we do not want the desire granted unless it is his will as well as ours. Our most earnest prayers should be for the salvation and welfare of others and for the progress of Christ's kingdom. But all the innocent desires of life that come to us may be presented simply to him. If he grants them, we enjoy their fulfilment as his personal gift; if he sees best to deny, we shall find even greater pleasure in following his plan for us.

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

Sometimes it is hard to make a boy get up in the morning, but if he has been "brought up" on Ivory Soap he is sure to be bright and clean when he reaches the breakfast table.

Children take to Ivory Soap. As babies, the floating cake fascinates them. Then, a little later, they realize what a pleasant bath it makes so that, while still very young, they are willing to attend to their own toilets. Thus the practice of cleanliness becomes a habit which not even the prospect of a late breakfast can alter.

It is only natural for Ivory Soap to influence its users in this way. It is so mild and pure that it feels soothing to the tenderest skin. It gives such a bubbly, copious lather that it is a delight to bathe with it. And it rinses so readily that the skin is left in its natural, healthy condition—glowingly, refreshingly clean.

MARSHALING THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ARMY

Plans for the Great International Sunday School Convention at Zürich, Switzerland

EIGHT DAYS OF CONFERENCE ON THE PROBLEMS OF THE WORK

A GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF ZÜRICH

LIKE generals planning the action for a mighty army from the vantage point that gives view of the field, the Sunday school workers of the world will confer and plan for their army at the International Sunday School convention in Zürich in July. The greatest and most successful leaders of the work in every land will have prominent parts in the deliberations of this great gathering. This is the opportunity that comes every three years for the thousands of devoted teachers who sometimes see the larger vision in the work-a-day duties of their regular teaching to come in contact with these master minds of the movement. It is expected that from the 8th to the 15th of July, the little Swiss city, Zürich, will witness such a gathering of representatives of all races as it has never before known. Two hundred and twenty-one countries are to be represented, and though some of them can only send their flags, the number from which delegates will be present is estimated at well over a hundred. On the last night of the convention there will be a Congress of Nations, when all of these flags will be massed upon the platform, and prayers offered in all languages represented.

The fleet which will carry the school pilgrims to their desired haven at Zürich consists of the following vessels with the dates of sailing: The Canopic from Boston, June 12; the Saxonia from New York, June 12; the Cassandra from Montreal, June 14; the Cymric from Boston, June 17; the Minnehaha from New York, June 21; the Scotian from Montreal, June 21; the Ryndam from New York, June 24; the Oceanic from New York, June 28; the Teutonic from Montreal, June 28. It will doubtless interest THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family to know that Dr. and Mrs. Wilbur F. Crafts, our Sunday School Lesson writers, have engaged passage on the Cassandra, and they have said to us that it would greatly delight them if a large number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class should do the same. During the nine days on the ocean it would be possible for such a group to hold CHRISTIAN HERALD Round Tables and Bible conferences daily.

What is the true significance of this great getting-together plan? Such a convention will afford opportunity for mutual helpfulness and uplift as well as the dissemination of the latest results of experimental work and of the newest statistics. The great object is to pass the Sunday school world in review before the gathered delegates. To this end, six commissions are now traversing the following lands in order to report the needs and opportunities in a Sunday school way: 1, Continental Europe; 2, South Africa; 3, India and Malaysia; 4, the Orient, comprising Japan, China, India, the Philippines and Hawaii; 5, Latin America; 6, Mohammedan lands. The recommendations to be made by these commissions will largely make up the program of the convention.

It will be a foretaste of that time when "all nations shall come and worship before God" (Rev. 15: 4). A booklet is to be distributed which contains thirty-eight pages of flags, and with each flag will be found the Sunday school statistics of that land, to consist of "number of Sunday schools, number of officers and teachers, number of pupils, population and percentage of population in Sunday school."

It will be inspiring to realize how great is the Sunday school army of the world. We sometimes get so firmly settled down in our home school that we forget how great is our belonging. The Sunday school enrolment of the world now numbers upwards of 30,000,000, and it is on the increase. In the United States alone there was an increase of 1,507,178 during the triennium between 1908 and 1911. The reports of all the nations and the descriptions of the various and varying conditions under which the work is carried on will transfigure these dry numbers into the glowing code messages that tell the story of the great battle of peace as it is waged round the world.

The great convention will impress the fact that through Jesus Christ there hath been made one brotherhood of all the nations and races of men. All race prejudices and race ambitions must disappear, and this will most effectually be realized when all assemble together to partake of the Lord's Supper.

Elaborate preparations are being made to make the sessions of the convention both as interesting and as instructive as possible. Prominent men from the many nations represented will deliver addresses and special services of many kinds are being planned. The United States and Canada will be especially well represented, as the president of the World's Sunday School Association is Dr. George Bailey of Philadelphia, and two of the vice-presidents are

SEEKING CHICAGO'S WAYFARERS

ONE HUNDRED wayfarers from the streets of Chicago have united with the well-known Immanuel Baptist Church of that city as a result of a unique and practical campaign that church has made for them. The accompanying photograph shows a group of men, most of whom first came to the church for help and employment, and have since become active church members.

On some cold mornings last winter as many as a thousand hungry men have entered this church to get warm and be fed. The pastor, Rev. Johnston Myers, arrives at the church at six A.M., often opening the doors to a hundred men even at this early hour. Hundreds of men owe their present jobs, both inside and outside of Chicago, to the free employment agency to which this pastor has devoted two whole days of each week for more than two years.

Recently attention has been attracted to a gathering of wayfarers and unfortunates at this church one Monday morning at which 300 men participated in an essay-writing contest, giving in one hundred words their reasons for their present condition. Only a small percentage laid all the blame on society. Scores acknowledged their own faults and weaknesses.

One typical essay gave the following five causes:

1. Unrestricted immigration. This brings so many foreigners to this country that there are not jobs enough to go around.

2. Incompetency, both from birth and from bad habits. Employers take only the best men; we are not the best; so they do not take us until they are obliged to.

3. Selfishness of employers. They ask their employees to work too many hours, thus shutting out other men from possible jobs.

4. The drink habit. Employers wish men upon whom they can depend; they cannot depend upon a drinking man.

5. Drifting away from religion.

Immanuel Baptist Church, with more than 2,000 members, is situated near the corner of Michigan Avenue and Twenty-second Street, less than two miles from the very heart of Chicago. The church is open seven days in the week, and fairly teems with activity in its many departments. There are four missions and five Sunday schools and the corps of Sunday school teachers numbers 150.

When the doors of the church are thrown open in the morning, it is but a few moments until the men waiting outside are seated at long tables in the church dining-room. Two people in the kitchen have already been preparing coffee and bread and butter. Men from the crowd are selected to serve and are paid ten cents each in addition to what they eat.

Following this breakfast, Dr. Myers excuses all who wish to go. As many as five hundred, however, have been known to remain, and with them the pastor discusses some of the current prol of the day, mostly problems lying close to thei lives. Many men wait to see him afterward and talk over privately their present circumsta

In the spring of the year, Dr. Myers has at the names of farmers in Michigan and even i far West who desire farm hands and who are ing to send money for their transportation Chicago. Dr. Myers buys the railroad ticket, starts the laborers to their respective destinat but unlike an employment agency, no fee is cha them for having secured them these posit Large employers of lab Chicago also look with f on Dr. Myers's work an sist by giving jobs to the whom he sends to them.

The men who have benefited in some way by Myers are to be found round the Great Lakes throughout the Middle W It is said that there scarcely a sailor ente Chicago Harbor but kn Dr. Myers and his work, many have come in pers touch with him. Hund of letters come to this pa from grateful men whom has helped. One letter w he received from Lake Fo Ill., was signed by eight for whom he had secured ployment. They all ass him that they were livin berly and trying to r good in every way.

The men who are fed a church during the time they are out of work also show their appreci by attending the church services on Sunday. hundred of these men have attended a single ser

Aside from the presence of these men, the ch membership is growing in numbers and in worl "People nowadays," says Dr. Myers, "like to themselves to a church which is accomplis something along practical lines, and where opportunities are offered for the service of fellow men."

American and one Canadian. The secretary of the association is Marion Lawrance of Chicago, whose name is perhaps better known than that of any other Sunday school worker in the world. In addition to this the Hon. William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, is scheduled to address the conference on "Temperance and Good Citizenship." Remembering the way the crowd was enthused by Mr. Bryan and followed his every movement at the Missionary Conference in Edinburgh, it seems practically certain that he will render a great service at the World's Sunday School Convention at Zürich.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible Class will have its representatives on the program of the convention, as both its leaders, Dr. and Mrs. Crafts, will take part. Mrs. Crafts has been invited to speak for Iceland, because it was through her efforts that the Sunday school movement was organized there in 1910. Dr. Crafts will speak on "The Duty of the Sunday School in Safeguarding Adolescent Youth." Dr. and Mrs. Crafts are also planning to send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD full stories of the convention and we expect most interesting and informing details from them. Any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who intends going to Zürich or might even be led to consider the matter seriously is invited to correspond with Dr. Crafts, addressing him at his home, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington, D. C.

But what a Babel all these tongues will make! Surely every man cannot hear in his own tongue as at Pentecost!

It has been decided to make the convention bilingual. All of the addresses will be given in English and German, as the two languages most generally used, though undoubtedly French, which has so long been regarded as the international language of governments and diplomacy, will also be used. All the addresses will be printed in English and German at least, and distributed among the delegates. There will be special conferences in various languages, including Esperanto, the universal language. This is according to the custom adopted in all world gatherings, such as the Peace Congress, Anti-Alcoholic Congress, Conventions at the Hague, etc., in which French is also used. The whole proceedings of the Sunday School Convention will ultimately be published in English.

A Special Message from the President of the World's Sunday School Convention

"Of the World's Sixth Sunday School Convention held in Washington, May, 1910, Hon. John Wanamaker, former postmaster general, and Hon. J W. Foster, ex-secretary of state, united in a st ment to the effect 'that no religious gathering held in the City of Washington had made so found an impression upon the city as had that vention.' Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman said at the vention: 'This is the greatest gathering of Chris people for such a purpose in the history of world.'

"From all that has transpired since the Wo Sunday School Convention was held in a erected on the brow of Mount Calvary in 1904 are justified in expressing a belief that God has special manner set his seal of approval upon work of this organization. The marvelous suc attending our efforts to promote the interests of kingdom of his Son throughout the world canno explained in any other way, and we confidently pect the Zürich Convention to exceed in interest promise any gathering of the kind ever held Europe.

"Arrangements made for transporting the de gates, their entertainment in Zürich, together with the program for the convention, are upon a sc seldom if ever equaled. Taken as a whole, the vention offers an opportunity of exceptional portance.

THE FALL OF SCUTARI—THE TURKS' LAST FIGHT IN EUROPE

AS THE Montenegrins were the first to take up arms in the Balkan struggle, so, too, they have been the last to secure an important victory. Almost immediately after the beginning of the war with Turkey, King Nicholas invested the fortress of Scutari and has persisted in his efforts to capture it until success was finally won. A few weeks ago the European Powers decided that the city and fortress for which the Montenegrins were making such terrible sacrifices were to become a part of the new principality of Albania. They practically ordered King Nicholas to withdraw his troops. To this he paid no attention. The next move of the great Powers was to conduct a naval demonstration by sending an international fleet to overawe the little kingdom. Montenegro continued her fight for the coveted city without the slightest attention to her visitors.

By a final desperate attack which began on April 22 and lasted incessantly for almost twenty-four hours the mountaineers broke down the last resistance of the Turkish garrison and occupied Scutari. Under the cover of darkness the Montenegrin troops made a successful assault along the entire front of the Turkish defenses. This was unexpected and the Turks were surprised to find the enemy at such close quarters. They made a number of counter-attacks and fought fiercely to drive the Montenegrins out of their works. At last, with the fall of all their outer defenses, Essad Pasha, the Turkish commander-in-chief, recognized the uselessness of further resistance and surrendered on the condition that his troops be allowed to march out with t arms.

Austria announces that unless the Powers co King Nicholas to withdraw from the newly capt city she will make war on him. The general o ion is that for the peace of Europe some way m be found to get the Montenegrins out of Scut On the other hand, King Nicholas in addressing people said, "Scutari is Montenegro's from to-d And the attitude in Russia is such that any atte to force the Montenegrins to abandon their p will stir up such popular disapproval as to aln endanger the Russian Government. Premier quith of Great Britain declares he has no doubt tat "rather sooner than later" an honorable and pe able settlement will be reached.

AIDING THE OHIO FLOOD VICTIMS

THE spectacular features of the mighty flood that swept, a few weeks ago, down the Ohio Valley are now all over. The scenes of complete inundation and of thrilling rescue now only history, but the heartache for the loss of lifetime's labor and the dreary prospects of ...ing all over again are still horribly real to ...y of our friends in Ohio and West Virginia. ...'s last report from Mr. E. R. Johnstone, THE ...RISTIAN HERALD'S special commissioner, makes ...ll these points plain. He says:

"There is a terrible sameness about the flood ...ld of work in the Ohio River Valley and along the ...ributaries. Conditions are found to be identical ...ver and over again. Since my last letter I have ...ade journeys up and down the Ohio River from ...rietta to Kenova with side trips along some of ...he smaller streams where the damage has been ...onsiderable. The great ...onder is that the loss of ...life was so small and the ...ol of property was so ...reat. Among the towns ...ch I have personally ...sited and to most of ...hich I would strongly ...ecommend the appor...ioning of assistance ...om the Western Relief ...und should it grow to ...ufficient proportions are ...Marietta, Unionville, ...Lowell and Beverly on ...the Muskingum River in ...Ohio, and Parkersburg, ...Belleville, Hartford, Ma...son City, Point Pleasant, ...Huntington, Guyandotte, ...Kenova and Kenova in ...West Virginia.

"I am omitting the ...names of several other ...towns I have visited be...cause the needs therein ...do not seem to warrant ...the distribution of relief ...additional to that which ...has been given from ...other sources. There is ...no denying that in all ...these places the evi...dences of destruction ...are to be seen on all ...sides, and the need for ...help was apparent ...even to the most casual ...observer. Against these evidences, however, the ...more pressing needs of some of the neighboring ...towns must be weighed. If space permitted I could ...tell of scores of instances where the result of a ...life's toil and saving has been destroyed utterly. ...I have learned of three cases of insanity induced by ...grief over losses caused by the flood. Many far...mers in the surrounding country lost not only all ...their stock, implements, houses, barns, outhouses and fur...niture, but the very soil itself was washed away, ...leaving only wide stretches of sand and pebbles.

"Of all the damage now visible that to Marietta ...at the mouth of the Muskingum River and to the ...towns along that river for about twenty miles is the ...most appalling. Marietta was a beautiful little ...city of about fifteen thousand inhabitants before it ...was 67 per cent. submerged. At some places in the ...principal business streets the water rose to a height of thirty feet and rushed with such force as to make the destruction almost equal to that at Dayton. Unionville has probably fifty houses, and all but six or seven were washed away so that not a stick was left. Three feet of mud was deposited on the second floors of those houses that remained standing. Practically the same condition exists in Lowell. The description fits one place about as well as the other. Beverly and the towns further up the Muskingum suffered in the same way, though in varying degrees.

"CHRISTIAN HERALD committees for the distribution of relief funds have been appointed and allotments of money made at the following cities and towns: Marietta, Parkersburg, Point Pleasant, Lowell, Beverly, Masonic City and Huntington. In addition to this I have taken advantage of the opportunity presented me to place a fund at the disposal of Governor Hatfield of West Virginia. This means that isolated cases of suffering which cannot be reached from the population centers will be looked after in the most competent manner.

"The readers and subscribers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who have already or may even yet subscribe to this relief fund may rest assured that every penny will be devoted to the needs of those who are in the most straitened circumstances. These days that I have spent in this district convince me that many a life will be saved from destitution and despair by these kindly given dollars. The expressions of gratitude that reach me from all sides are heartrending in their sincerity. I have so far arranged for the distribution of $8,000; $1,000 each in Marietta, Huntington, and Parkersburg (with the work of these committees the smaller towns are included), and an equal amount through Governor Hatfield. At Point Pleasant $700 has already been used and I deem it advisable to increase the appropriations at Marietta, Parkersburg and Huntington $1,000 each. I shall also devote $300 more to the work at Point Pleasant. I go to Zanesville to-morrow to make the trip down the Muskingum River so that I may be fully aware of the conditions in that section."

The details of several instances of almost entire loss come to us in a letter from a West Virginia subscriber. This lady writes: "I have been a subscriber to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for a number of years and am one of the little-town sufferers who have escaped mention among the big ones. I am not alone, however, for all around me are others who have lost just as I have. One dear old lady, nearly ninety-four years of age, and her daughter have been reduced to great poverty by the flood. The daughter, who is also a widow, had been unable to do a great deal toward the providing of the living for some time past. They had mortgaged their little home for support, and now that the sixty-foot flood is gone it is left standing, but greatly damaged. My own home, which was bought about a year ago, and upon which I had put several hundred dollars' expense, in fact, about all I had, to make it a comfortable home, is utterly wrecked. No flood that has ever visited this district before would have moved it, but when the water reached a depth of fifty-five feet it toppled over against a tree. As the water went down it settled back with its porches gone, chimneys gone, doors and windows and goods washed away.

"Government supplies have kept us from want until regular food could be shipped in, the mattresses and blankets of the Government Relief especially proving a great comfort to those who lost all. A number of ministers have had charge of the supply station and have done fine service, but all say they see no prospects of help to restore lost property.

"No one can know what it is to lose all by a single catastrophe but those who have passed through such trials. We can only say as Job did of old: 'The Lord gave and the Lord taketh away. Blessed be the name of the Lord.' And we are no poorer than our Master, for he said, 'The Son of man hath no place to lay his head.' It is ours only to trust him the more. If, in the handling of the money which generous and more fortunate members of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family will surely send you for use in this part of the country, all those worse off than we are have been helped, any aid that you could give us would be more than thankfully received."

BEAUTY AND BANDS

A SERMON

By

Rev. Richard Braunstein *

TEXT: "And I took unto me two staves; the one I called Beauty, and the other I called Bands; and I fed the flock." Zech. 11: 7

THE meaning of this somewhat mysterious verse is easily comprehended when studied in the light of the book and chapter in which it appears. Throughout the prophecy of Zechariah Israel is likened to a flock of sheep which had been led and fed and ruled by sinful shepherds. Wicked kings had so misused them, false prophets had so misled them, that the people had become a loathsome mass of corruption and evil. There was no beauty, neither was there any soundness in all their borders. Every department of their public and private life was reeking in vice. Society, state and church were fast falling into ruin under the devastating influences of unbridled passion and unchecked sin.

But to Zechariah the word of the Lord came saying, "Go out and feed my perishing flocks and quickly exterminate their bloody shepherds." So Zechariah arose, clothed in the authority and power of Almighty God, and going out to the downtrodden people of Israel, carried with him two staves, simply as symbols of the twofold nature of the salvation that he brought them.

Beauty and Strength

The nation was physically and morally and actually unlovely and loathsome, so the shepherd called his first staff Beauty in token of what his kind care would do for them. He will so kindly lead them and care for them and fold them with this principle or rod called Beauty that they will become a people of most upright living, noble bearing and pure and lovely character.

His second staff he called Bands, which signifies that while the people are not only lacking in moral qualities and physical beauty, but also in strength, while they are unsound and in a disintegrating condition of ruin, still by this rod which he calls Bands he will so steady them, and so strengthen and upbuild them, that they will become a people of exceeding great stability of health and moral character.

In other words, the salvation that God sends to the perishing world is of a twofold nature: it beautifies the unlovely character and gives strength to the weak. This is done by the principles, or rods, called Beauty and Bands—the former to ornament and beautify, the latter to give union and strength.

Beauty and strength are the shrines of our admiration. They stand for the beneficent influences of everything that is good in life. They appeal to us with a mysterious voice which almost charms us into devotion. What is it that guides, like magic, the artist's brush in the painting of his masterpiece? It is nothing less than his sense of the good and strong. A perfect painting, the critics will tell you, is one in which beauty and strength, ornament and stability are so perfectly intermingled that they give no sense of discord to the most sensitive eye. Perfection of light and shade, with weakness of character or landscape, gives the picture the condemnation of overtone, profuse ornament, unbalanced skill in construction; while stability of bearing, minus artistic shade, gives the impression of crudeness, coldness and unsatisfying beauty. Beauty and strength must be united.

The Five Great Arts

The same may be said when we travel the sphere of sculpture. The sculptor who, like Michael Angelo of old, can so skilfully wield his chisel over the yielding marble as to hew away just enough of the harsh stone to produce the image of exquisite delicacy and refined texture, and yet can leave just enough of the stable marble to glow through the limbs and features and give the impression of nobility of strength, such a sculptor has reached the ideal of his art. He has introduced and perfectly employed the two principles essential of Beauty and Bands.

How manifestly true is all that we have said in the art of architecture! What is it that elicits our expressions of delight when we see a well-constructed building of any kind? Have you not been awed, when gazing upon some massive cathedral or amazing palace? It is the combination of beauty and strength that holds us. Perhaps never before in the history of architecture did a company of contractors so thoroughly understand their business as did the architects of the World's Fair buildings at Chicago. Standing upon some lofty eminence among them, or in the midst of an open court, one was at first overwhelmed with a scene so beautiful and so gigantic. Those long avenues of waterways, lined with massive piles of stone, of the purest white, overhung with cornices of silver splendor, and domes of gold, gave one the feeling that the long-dreamed-of Utopia of the fairy tale and poet's song had actually come, or else that for a second time the ecstatic vision of Patmos had been vouchsafed to men, and the New Jerusalem in all her radiant beauty of strength and splendor had again descended to earth. The efforts of that most famous exhibition found their consummation in the features of loveliness and strength, of vastness and magnificence and magnitude, Beauty and Bands.

So these principles are recognized in music. The peals of the organ pipes, as they float down the long aisles of the cathedral, thrilling the very walls with the charming harmony of their vibration, must have something more than volume in order to awaken the fondest emotions of the soul; they must also be heavily laden with sweetness and delicacy of expression, or else they are harsh, grating, rasping noises that jar the ear or frenzy the soul. The song that charms us most is the one which in its rendering has displayed the exquisite skill of blended sweetness and strength, accent and volume, emotion and firmness, beauty and stability.

So also in literature, we are deeply impressed with the necessity of combined ornament and strength. A book, a lecture, or sermon which is flooded in flowery expressions or high sounding phrases or flowing words without real strength of thought is nauseating trash and exasperating to the common sense; while sound literature in any form, without skill of expression, becomes slovenly, heavy and unbearable. He who aims for real beauty of style and at the same time for purest depth of meaning cannot fail to delight the most fastidious taste and instruct the most critical audience.

Strength in Character

But when we have exhausted the five great arts, we have not begun to exhaust the reign of their two appealing features. For the very forms of nature under our feet and above our heads are all of them uttering the same great anthem. Each of them is telling the same great parable of blended beauty and strength. The diamond stars which sparkle in the sky all night and make the heavens resplendent with their glory, are not mere sparks of beauty which can be extinguished by a single blast; they are, in all their splendor, great rock-ribbed worlds, as ancient as the sun. Glory and greatness, grandeur and strength, blended with beauty—it is this that calls forth our admiration in the revelation of the stars.

The sun in its rising and going down; the monarchs of the forest, the trees, the boldness of the rocks, the leaping cataracts, the majestic mountain peaks, the bewildering wildness, all nature in her thousand phases, reveals herself in beauty and ruggedness, in delicate colors and splendid vivid hues, as well as in strength and stability which shall last until the ages are done.

But above all do we seek these two principles in the realm of character. In what relation do beauty and strength stand to true nobility? Beauty of soul implies purity, patience, humility, goodness, sympathy, love and all that bright galaxy of kindred graces which impart not only splendor and ornament, but also high dignity and extensive intrinsic value.

Strength of character is the expression which implies firmness, stability and steadfastness. It is applied to a person who in the midst of temptation, trials, sorrows and difficulties of every conceivable description can stand his ground and display an individuality so pronounced, so sure, so rooted, so grounded, so immovably founded on the rocks of right and truth, that, like the everlasting peaks themselves, it is a barrier of defense against all powers that prey and all things that make huma life unblessed. A strong character is one that v know just where to find in the most contrary win and distressing vicissitudes of life, as well as in t time of calm and in the most cheerful surroun ings. It is a character that can be depended upo

Beauty and strength! Oh, where can we find t character that properly combines the two? Ho rare they are! How scattered! We look about u and see here and there a person who has som thing of the ornamental, perhaps a little modest and gentleness, but he is weak, has no soundnes no depth, no strength, is led away by a popular vic or temptation of the moment. Or, again, we s here or there a soul that manifests itself in gre strength, great courage, individuality and powe but is impure in habit or conversation; is strong i the wrong, but not in the right; is unlovely an lacks in those elements which make beauty of sou

The Strength of Christ

Beauty of character without strength is orna ment without usefulness; strength without beaut is usefulness misused. They go hand in hand, hea to heart. Surely these things appeal to us, but ho are we to obtain beauty and strength? How ca we appropriate them and make them our own There is but one way and that is by drawing nea to Jesus Christ. We can never do it alone. Me have tried it and failed. There is no going on t perfection without his help. We may search th cults of the ages; in vain we may imitate th purest lives of the world past and present. Th fact ever remains that we have sinned and therefor fallen short of the glory of God. Because we hav wandered far from the Father's house, we are wea and unlovely. Christ knows the paths we hav taken, that have led us away. He also can sho us the way back. He is our Shepherd, and he wit his two staves of salvation, Beauty and Bands, wil lead us and direct us. Here for the first time in th history of the ages is a man; here for the first tim is unimpeachable beauty, harmoniously blended an perfectly intermingled with astounding strength.

The reason why so many men look upon the char acter of Christ as effeminate and weak is simpl because they have looked upon but one side; the have been dazzled by his beauty and have neve gotten in touch with his gigantic strength. Christ' life was inexpressibly beautiful, but above al things it was strong. It amazes us and it is abov our poor understanding, such purity and yet suc firmness; such meekness and yet such boldness such modesty and yet so much courage. He reveal his beauty of character in the tears at Lazarus grave, and manifests courageous strength ther among the angry mob by the fearlessness of hi coming. He could attract the thousands by a singl miracle illustrating the beauty of his mission, ye in the midst of the well-fed multitude, he is no afraid to speak the word, in the strength of God which makes the thousands leave him. He is beau tiful. He is strong. Beauty and Bands are th staves of his salvation which he brings to us. He i the Way, the Truth, the Light. There is no othe way, no other truth, no other light, whereby w might be saved. Men speak of Christ and othe Masters. There is no other Master. A strong an beautiful life he offers us. Let us take his gift an be glad, and make merry in our hearts because o our deliverance.

THE BIBLE IN EGYPT

BY CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

I WAS awakened at 5.30 A.M. on my first morning at Assiut College in Egypt by hearty singing in the courtyard just below my window. It was scarcely light, but upon looking out I discovered Egyptian students running here and there gathering in small groups in different windows of the dormitories. Upon later inquiry I was impressed to learn that 350 Christian students met each morning for a half hour before breakfast (6.5 to 6.15) for voluntary Bible study and devotion. These young men usually gather in groups of from ten to twenty students each and the exercises are in charge of the students' Christian Union of the college. The president of this Christian Union informed me that 280 of these Bible students went out each week to nineteen Coptic and Mohammedan villages of the country surrounding the college to preach. In one of these villages twenty-four persons joined the church on a Sunday shortly previous to my visit. These results are attributed entirely to the Bible teaching and evangelism of these Assiut College students.

At nine o'clock the same day I was asked to address 480 students at chapel in the college, and I have seldom faced a student audience more responsive to the presentation of religious messages. In the audience were dozens of Mohammedan students and at the back of the room I observed a Moslem sheik escorting certain of his native students to their places and afterwards taking his seat in the audience among them.

On the evening previous I had attended a regular daily student prayer meeting at which I was told there were three hundred Coptic and Moslem young men in attendance. The exercises consisted of songs and prayers by the Egyptian students who had been converted to Christianity through the instrumentality of this Christian school.

During my visits to other schools and missions in Egypt, I had heard of Assiut College and its efficient leadership by President R. S. McClanahan as representing a vital factor among the training agencies of the American Mission in Egypt.

The training of this institution is comprehending some of the most important situations now called for in Egypt. In one of the lecture rooms I asked the students to rise, signifying the particular professions for which they were preparing. I found students who answered to the following vocations: Medicine, law, pharmacy, preaching, business, teaching and government service. The following summary of graduates reveals the kind of multiplying service which this institution is rendering to modern Egypt.

Although the majority of the students are at present students or converts from the Coptic religion, there is a decided tendency for Moslem parents to send their sons and daughters to this and to other mission schools in Egypt. In fact, at present education is almost a craze amongst the Egyptians. It is one of the chief satisfactions of this people to point to the fact that there were in 1898 only 7,536 pupils in the primary schools of the country against 27,095 students during the year 1910. A similar growth has been witnessed in the secondary schools, though I have failed to find yet an institution, either government or native, with a more comprehensive and effective type of training than Assiut College is giving to its students.

The sign of particular progress in Egypt at present exists in the fact that in spite of the daily Bible lessons required in the curriculum of the missionary colleges, where the life and teachings of Christ and the growth and results of the Christian Church are taught to all students, the Mohammedan young men are crowding in to the Christian schools. Chapel exercises are also compulsory each day for all students at Assiut College, and three classes per week in certain religious branches in addition are required of each student. Even ten years ago it would have been considered almost an unheard-of event to witness large numbers of Moslem students attending religious exercises with Christian students in any institution in Egypt.

In conversation with Dr. John R. Alexander, the former president of Assiut College, this able Arabic scholar and Christian missionary said:

"It is the Bible that has made our Evangelical Christians what they are. The Mohammedan is buying it, and is astonished at the morality of Jesus. It is upon the Bible that we examine our candidates for the ministry. It is the Bible which is being thrown open everywhere in the country upon which we depend more and more for evangelizing."

A GROUP OF STUDENTS AT ASSIUT COLLEGE

There are two reasons for Bible emphasis in Egypt; first, because in this part of the Mohammedan world public preaching among Moslems is still attended with many difficulties and often with danger. The English Government has expressly stated at times that it could not be responsible for the protection of the lives of missionaries evangelizing publicly outside their own mission stations. There are, to be sure, certain traveling evangelists, especially in Upper Egypt, and there are a few Moslem converts to Christianity, who from time to time engage in discussion and preaching in the vicinity of Cairo. Such evangelization, however, is not at all general.

The change occurring in the past twenty-five years in the attitude of Islam in Egypt has been a marked one. The spirit of Mohammedans is not longer characterized by the rabid and intolerant persecution which formerly attended any effort of Christian missions to reach the Moslems. While the present period is not one of conversion to Christianity, it may be called a period of investigation of Christianity.

The Bible, too, has access to a constituency of great importance in Egypt. Men who will not break with their faith because of the social or political consequences that attend such apostasy are frequently open to the consideration of the Bible. These men will listen on cars, on street corners, to the colporteurs and Bible readers. The Oriental mind, which is prone to argument as the sparks fly upwards, turns readily toward discussion of religious truths. Two of the most scholarly Englishmen whom I have met in North Africa, one in Tunis, the other in Cairo, are giving a good part of their time to the thorough mastery of Arabic and the Koran for the purpose of being able to forcibly present in discussion and writing the weaknesses of the book of the prophet as compared with the sacred Book of Christianity. The Bible is today Christianity's most strategic weapon in contending with Mohammedanism—Christianity's chief religious opponent.

The second formidable reason for Bible study in Egypt is because this study is revealing perhaps the chief advantage which Christianity holds over Islam—its adaptability to modern conditions.

To the Moslem the Koran is infallible—miraculous in eloquence and without error. It is furthermore claimed that the teaching of this book covers with its particular injunctions every detail and phase of human life. It is this last named characteristic of the Koran which marks its present-day weakness. It is a book of the seventh century claiming for itself dogmatic and literal obedience in the twentieth century. I visited the famous Moslem University, the El Azhar, and found that practically the same medieval text books and methods of study are used as when the university was founded a thousand years ago. The Koranic injunctions concerning slavery, usury, polygamous marriage, inheritance, and many other matters, are utterly ancient and at variance with the views of modern civilization such as to-day is sweeping down into the Nile country from Europe. The Moslem youths in the "reformed" schools see that Islam is a stationary faith, fixed by a code of rules which, however suitable they may have been to the pagan time in which they were written, are quite out of harmony with an age which has led men out to a larger conception of religion and to an advanced morality.

The striking contrast between the Bible and the Koran consists in the teaching of Christ. The Koran has no New Testament, no fuller revelation of God than the rigorous legislation of an ancient century. The Moslem reads the New Testament and discovers the temper and the attitude of Christianity in the words so fatal when applied to the book of his own faith, "It is the letter that killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

The influence of this discovery upon the young Egyptian is striking; it is sometimes tragic. The Europeanized Egyptian, seeing the inadequacy of the Koran to fit modern times, and not daring to cut himself free from his traditional religion, becomes agnostic. This youth furnishes the opportunity for intelligent leadership in Bible study and Bible teaching. The new wine of civilization is slowly but certainly bursting the old wineskins of rigid Islam. As Lord Cromer has summed up the situation:

"Although there are many highly cultured gentlemen who profess the Moslem religion, it has yet to be proved that Islam can assimilate civilization without succumbing in the process."

TOPICS OF INTEREST FROM THE FOREIGN MAIL

—FOR THE FIRST TIME in history the united political parties created in a national election have, by means of a nation-wide labor strike, devoid of violence, compelled the adoption of a measure that promises to bring about a reform in the suffrage which in the end practically reverse the result of the contest last June. This occurred in Belgium when, on April 21, the government made its own a resolution introduced in the Chamber of Deputies by the Liberal leader, thereby causing the strike to be called off on the 24th. The reform demanded was that every voter should have only one vote. The system against which this unprecedented protest was made gave every citizen over twenty-five one vote, but every citizen above thirty-five, with one or more children, and paying $1 or more in house tax, had a supplementary vote, as had also a citizen over twenty-five who owned $400 worth of real estate. Graduates of universities, office-holders or ex-office-holders had two supplementary votes. No person had more than three votes, and failure to vote was a misdemeanor. In 1911 the number of voters was 1,700,000, of whom 995,000 had one vote, 395,000 two votes, and 310,000 three votes. The election result in June was to send to the Chamber 101 Clericals, 44 Liberals, 39 Socialists and 2 Democrats, giving the Clericals a majority of 16 over the coalition. The platform on which the Liberals and Socialists had united stood for Anti-clericalism, universal suffrage, compulsory non-sectarian education and an increase of the national military forces.

—DR. LIEBKNECHT, the leader of the Socialist party in the German Reichstag, has brought charges against the world-renowned house of Krupp, at Essen, on the floor of the Chamber, that have deeply stirred the whole nation. The great manufacturers of arms and ammunition were accused, among other things, with subsidizing agents to incite certain French papers to publish attacks on Germany likely to assist the passage of appropriations that would be spent on supplies furnished by themselves. He also said that their secret agents bribed men in the war ministry to give them advance information as to intended extensions in armaments; and in suggesting that the Krupps were willing to sell out their own country, he referred to correspondence in 1868 between Frederick Krupp and Napoleon III that indicated the desire of the former to supply artillery for the French army. When the war minister confessed that certain minor army officers had been bribed, but that he could not say how far the Krupps were involved until his investigation had concluded, Dr. Liebknecht replied with a challenge to the Krupps to bring action for libel against him, when he would justify every statement. On April 23, the Reichstag passed a resolution providing for an investigation of all armament contracts by a committee of that body.

THE BALKAN RELIEF FUND AT WORK

THE WIDOW AND THE ORPHAN

A LITTLE LECTURE ON CHRISTIANITY

"SO MUCH MONEY!" (ONE DOLLAR)

SINCE the last report of the work of the Balkan Relief Committee was published, several letters and a number of snapshot pictures have reached THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Pastor Furnajieff. Three of the best pictures are here reproduced. They show Pastor Furnajieff engaged in relief distribution and the attendant evangelistic work. The letters give the details of individual appeals to the committee for aid and the efforts of the members to relieve the distress of the most needy and administer the fund as wisely as possible. Many cases of poverty verging on starvation are still presenting themselves, and relief work is still being prosecuted in the territory advised for our efforts. The receipt of the following additional contributions to the Balkan Relief Fund is acknowledged:

MEXICO'S REVOLUTION—THROUGH A WOMAN'S EYE

BY THE WIFE OF A MEXICAN GOVERNMENT OFFICIAL

ON SUNDAY morning, February 9, we were awakened by the sound of fire-arms. "Those are the mausers," said my husband, but it soon became evident that machine-guns were at work. In a few moments the servants came bursting in, trembling with fright, and stammered out: "There is a bola" (a tumult, a street mob). They have sticks and stones, and they have wounded a child on the head."

It proved not to be a bola, but a revolution. General Mondragon's artillerymen had gone during the night to the military prison of Santiago, liberated Bernardo Reyes, who first rose in arms against the legal government in the north; together they went to the penitentiary and set Felix Diaz free. Felix Diaz, who always chooses what is safest for himself, went to the national arsenal, and Bernardo Reyes to the government palace. The guards of the palace were ready to receive the invaders, but they had been changed before Reyes arrived, so that what was to have been a safe entry was turned into a desperate fight. General Reyes, who with pistol in hand and riding a spirited horse had been shouting "Viva Felix Diaz," was shot down. Madero came riding in from Chapultepec. As he was fired on by the hostile troops he went into a photograph gallery, and there on the balcony addressed the people. General Huerta, who with all the principal officers of the army was in the conspiracy, but who in order to retain the appearance of loyalty had not yet identified himself publicly with the rebels, went to Madero and protested his loyalty, saying, "Come to the palace, it is still yours." Madero was a truthful man. He had the personal valor to meet an armed foe; but he never could fathom the heart of a traitor. Madero entered the palace with Huerta, called a council of generals, and said: "The situation is critical, much blood will be shed; tell me as man to man, do I count with your support? To resign at this moment would be an act of cowardice, but if you do not wish to adhere to my cause take me into custody and save the blood of the people." They protested that they would defend the constitutional government of which he was the head.

The national arsenal was now in the hands of Felix Diaz. Then began the most astounding farce of the century. Cannon were brought from Vera Cruz and Morelos, troops called from different States and the famous siege of the citadel begun.

Ten thousand men were placed in battle array. The cannon roared, the machine-guns sputtered, the mausers cracked. For eight days and a part of the nights we had that infernal din in our ears. People paid enormous prices for charcoal and meat; servants and working-people risked their lives to gain their daily bread—and lost them. Bodies lay unburied or were burned with gasoline during the eight days of bombardment. Five thousand wounded lay in the hospitals. Then came a lull.

The regular army had suffered little, Felix Diaz still less; but the volunteer corps had been shattered, and the people shot down like dogs to inspire terror. Then suddenly the cathedral bells began to ring, and people not in the secret thought the arsenal had fallen into the hands of the federals. In the balcony of the government palace appeared General Huerta saying: "Peace has come; there will be no more war; there will be plenty of work. Go home. I am now your president."

What had happened during that lull no one knows but God and the traitors, for the lips that would speak the truth are stilled in death or dumb with terror.

According to official accounts, who can believe thieves and murderers? President Madero was asked by the army to resign, and flatly refused. What happened later nobody has been permitted to know. They say he resigned. Who has seen t evidences? Who has seen the signatures?

They carried out the farce of law. Madero a Pino Suarez having resigned, the presidency fell the secretary of state, Pedro Lascurain. I named his cabinet, General Huerta being his s retary of state. After being president fifty-sev minutes Pedro Lascurain resigned, and Preside Huerta was recognized by the Senate as his su cessor. Thus in three years Mexico has had fi presidents.

The same day—the government does not do the honor of indicating the hour—Gustavo Mader the president's brother, was sent to the arser under arrest; there, it is generally believed, he w tortured to death, his eyes torn out and pieces c from his body.

Official accounts say he tried to escape, and w shot. Huerta (I do not condescend to call h president) says he gave no order of execution, b murder will out! The implacable enemies of t Madero family could not let his death remain secret. His body, thrown into a pit, was not giv to the family until decomposition rendered it u recognizable.

The horrible tragedy rushed on apace!

The ministers of the United States and Jap interceded diplomatically for Madero and Pi Suarez. But the church, the so-called aristocrac and the party of Felix Diaz were determined on h day of doom. As president, they feared Mader as a captive they feared him more, and dead th still fear him.

The thirty years' dictadura of Porfirio Diaz ha produced what the glorious (?) reigns of Louis XI and Louis XV produced in France.

The mighty revolution like an irresistible av lanche rushes on. The present reaction signifi

A Story in Two Parts, of Which This Is Part One

SAID Mrs. Mouse, "See what a charming rug I have for our house! Such a find!"

"What a manager you are, my dear!" said Mr. Mouse.

And what a hunter you are! I smell something cious."

A fine bit of cheese, I suspect, my love. Come, ne!"

)ver the high pasture bright with dew that lay the first level sunshine like a cloak of jewels, ng Erle Snow walked with long strides and a vncast face. Young as he was, life seemed all r for him. It was not worth living at all. The vens had fallen. It was impossible to believe— he knew it was true. It was, at any rate, impsible to live in the same place with her. How ld he see her and not love her still? How could dare love her after this? Marry her, and see ldren born to inherit— No, oh no, there was to neither wife nor child for him to the bitter end.

A girl came round the thicket on the crest of the , her bright blue cotton gown a deeper value on t blue of the sky behind her. A swift sunbeam ght and glinted on her hair a moment, and mined her exquisite loveliness. She hung her d as she saw the young man striding up the spe, but she did not hasten her steps. On the contry, it seemed almost beyond her strength to take other. She paused till he came up to her. Then, vhout looking at him, as if she could not trust rself, she drew a plain gold ring from her finger, d held it towards him.

'That is best," she said.

'Jes' so," he answered.

And then, before turning, she glanced up and met gaze of angry accusation, reproach, passion, th one long look of an almost infinite tenderness, d was gone, running like a fawn.

He was right, he told himself as he went down hill. She had seemed to scorn to make denial. e had not denied. But her action was confession. ing along he looked about him at the places that ould know him no more, the green plain, the low een hills, the purple heights beyond them, the arkling stream, the great sky arching over wood d river, and his heart yearned to it and yearned her. But he went straight on, moving as in a eam. He must get away. Annie Palmer must ase to exist for him.

That night he left the place. Except for a brief stay now and then, he did not return till his father's failing health required him, and he took the store himself. In one of these visits he learned that Annie Palmer had married Robin Graham, a man he was glad he had disliked before. And when he came back to care for his father he brought a wife with him—the very opposite of Annie—who ruled him with a rod of iron, not that he loved her so much, but that he did not love her more. When she died, Erle reasserted himself, and took his boy, a handsome black-eyed lad, into the store with himself, and said he would make a man of him. The boy was his heart's delight, all that was left him, he used to say—but that was not because his wife was no more.

So the years had passed, as years do in quiet places, like beads on a thread, each giving a new facet to the sun for eyes that perceive it.

Eyes could perceive but little change in Annie, however, except that she had grown more still and pensive. But her own eyes had become sightless, though they were beautiful still—sightless, her mother insisted, because of her long, long grief. Robin Graham had died and left her with no other possession than a young daughter. But what a pretty daughter! "She's 'most the pictur' o' you, Annie, time you hed that blue ginggum—there's a piece of it in the spare room quilt," said Annie's mother, with whom she and the child, greatly welcomed, had gone back to live, in the little house on the hill-top behind the wood, "time Erle Snow was makin' up to you—remember?"

"Was he ever?" in a far-away voice.

"Was he ever! W'en you cried yer eyes out after he'd gone off!"

"Could I cry my eyes out for any one?"

"But they're out," thought the mother, although she did not say it.

"Mother! Mother!" cried Annie, divining her mother's mind.

"Ye hadn't orter, marm," said the Bound Boy.

"Hadn't orter what?"

"Hev thoughts ye can't speak on," he said as he piled up the big chips he had brought in.

"I guess I've a right to my thoughts," said the little old woman, whose temper was testy. "I guess there wouldn't be any thoughts at all if folks couldn't think what they can't speak on."

"You can think thoughts of God and heaven and all that, but you can't speak 'em out."

"I can keep them to myself then. You're bound to be a preacher, John."

"I'm bound to be a Bound Boy. And I shall be a Bound Boy all my life. I ain't ever goin' ter leave ye, marm."

Annie put out her hands gropingly towards him. He wiped his own hands down the leg of his trousers, and took the little slim fingers in both of his. In his heart was the chivalry of the knight who wore his lady's scarf and kissed his lady's hand, but it was not his to speak such thoughts.

"You're a good boy, anyways, John. You was born good," said Mrs. Palmer, a tear in her voice, after all. "You ben a sort o' conscience to me. I do' no' what we'd 'a' done without ye, these latter years. And I do' no' what we're goin' ter do with ye now. I ain't got means to fairly feed myself."

"You ain't! But I don't need a great deal, do I, marm?" somewhat wistfully.

"You'd orter, 'ith all ye do."

"You mean, marm, you want me to take my freedom?" There was a flush on the freckled face and a glow in the wide blue eyes, wandering eyes, like blown robins' eggs on a string.

"I'll hev to let ye, boy. W'enever ye can find suthin' ter do. I ain't got no chice. Clary's goin' ter dress-make, an' that 'll be the heft of our dependunce. Annie can't do anythin' much, o' course; and I ain't good for nothin'. It's a shame, that Savin's Bank's bustin'! Sence it failed up I ain't got more'n enough lef' ter keep a bird alive."

"I s'pose I'd call this home fer a while," said John, adapting himself to the situation although his voice shook a little. "You'd let me come nights to sleep in my chamber? I'd see you hed yer wood fetched in an' sech thin's, and I'd make the garding in the spring same as ever. I don't want ter be cut off from ye. I ain't got nobody else. You've all ben orfle good to me."

"Oh, John, it's you've ben good to us!" cried Annie.

"John," said her mother, "o' course this house is yourn long's ye live, or there's a stick of it stan'in'. It mos' kills me—but what I ain't got I can't give. And I guess you can't live on a sup o' milk and a pertater, an' do a man's work. You're welcome to house an' harth, but ye've gotter look out an' fewd fer yerself. There!"

Annie was trembling as her mother spoke. "That's all right, marm," he said quickly. "Don't ye take on now, Mis' Graham. It's allers darkes' jes' afore sun-up, I've heered ye say. I've heered ye say, marm, never trouble trouble till trouble troubles you—"

"Lord, as ef 'twarn't troubling me now!"

"Sho! I ain't nobody's slave now, and I can work an' bring home money. Not that ye ever made any sort o' slave o' me, Mis' Palmer. You've allers ben an own mother."

THE "POPE AND POLITICS"

BY PASTOR WILLIAM SCHOENFELD

UNDER the heading, "Pope and Politics," the Marian, a Roman Catholic quarterly, published at Opelika, Alabama, and enjoying the special endorsement of James Cardinal bbons and the Rt. Rev. Edw. P. Allen, Bishop Mobile, in its April issue accuses THE CHRISTIAN ERALD and all others of misrepresentation who arge the Papacy with claiming other than purely iritual authority and with seeking the conquest of nerica by any other than spiritual means and for y other than spiritual ends. It declares: "Cathics do not believe that the Pope has any divine ght to interfere with our country in things purely litical. The Pope has no right to interfere with r politics." "These Popes" (who did interfere in ings political) "had no divine right to interfere these things political; they had a human right, d this human right came from a human source. e source was the people; 'twas they who gave is right; 'twas they who could take it away." he nations gave to it (Papacy) a temporal power be judge among them in their disputes. To this wer they appealed; by this power the Popes ade and unmade kings, divided lands among the sputants, released peoples' allegiance from unorthy rulers. But no Pope ever claimed that he d this power by divine right, and Catholic naons never believed he so held it. Hence we see atholic nations in those days battling against the ope and still retaining sincere belief in his spirial supremacy." To the question, "But what ould happen if the Pope again should become the reat political power of Europe, and should muster l the fleets and armies of Europe to subdue us to e papal flag? What would Catholics in this coun-y do?" the Marian answers: "If, by an impossile supposition, the Pope should man army and fleet to storm our coast, do you know what Catholics here would do? You would have two million Catholics in the American army ready to die to resist the Pope's invasion; you would have thirteen million Catholics in their homes praying for their sons, brothers and fathers in the field; you would have forty-five thousand Catholic nuns upon their knees before the tabernacle beseeching the God of armies to strike the guns from the Roman emissaries. You would have seventeen thousand priests in the front ranks of the army fighting till they died for the Constitution of the United States. We would be loyal Catholics still; we would say to that Pope: 'We shall render unto God the things that are God's. Yes, but we will render also unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's.'"

Surely, these statements will strike as remarkable both the student of history and the everyday American citizen. Not that somewhat similar statements have not been made before, but they were made by laymen, and while admitting the hierarchy's lust after political power and control over political institutions, these laymen asked the American people to trust the Catholic laity to prove itself loyal to the country and its Constitution. Significant are the admissions here made as to what Roman Popes have done in days gone by, but more significant still we confess the contention made as to the source of the political power wielded by them, and above all significant and startling the declaration that no Pope ever claimed this political power by divine right. So, then, Gregory VII, Innocent III and Boniface VIII did not claim the power of the keys, the spiritual power, as the greater, to include the lesser, the temporal, and to constitute them lords and sovereigns over all temporal rulers and governments! But, pray, when and where did the people and nations confer upon the Popes sovereignty over themselves and elect them judges and arbiters, with the right and power to make and unmake kings, divide their lands and release their people from allegiance to them when adjudged unworthy? We know not by what authority the writer in the Marian, presumably the editor, undertakes to speak for the whole Catholic Church, clergy and laity, in America. To the best of our knowledge, the Pope is the only person in the Roman Catholic Church recognized as vested with authority to speak for the entire Roman Catholic Church, or for any part of it, as the divinely appointed infallible teacher of faith and morality. And if there be still another authority in such matters it is a church council. Yet the writer cites neither a Pope nor a plenary church council in substantiation of his teaching as being that of the Roman Catholic Church. We remember statements made by such recent Popes as Pius IX and Leo XIII which to us appear utterly at variance with the declarations of the Marian. We remember that the Americanism advocated in Archbishop Ireland's book was condemned, and so far as we know neither the clergy nor laity of the Catholic Church in America have made protest against such condemnation. We remember that Cardinal Gibbons, though he declared himself exceedingly well satisfied with separation of church and state as a policy here in our country, has never yet gone on record as subscribing to complete separation of church and state as a principle. Hence are we moved to ask: Will Archbishop Ireland, Cardinal Gibbons and the other high dignitaries of the Church of Rome in America, not excepting Father Phelan, unqualifiedly subscribe to the commitment made of or

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG — MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON — SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

California and the Japanese

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON has lifted his hand momentarily from the tariff lever to apply it to the more urgent Japanese-California problem. For weeks past the country has been hearing daily of stringent anti-Japanese land laws before the California Assembly, which are represented as calculated to produce serious complications in the relations existing between the two governments. One of the bills bars all Asiatics who are "ineligible to citizenship" from owning land in that State, and is drawn in terms that are interpreted as sharply discriminating against Japan, and which virtually class the subjects of that country with the Chinese. Such a bill, if enacted into law, would come into direct conflict with our treaty with Japan.

Now, California, above all other States, has felt the results of Japanese immigration and the growing influence of that race in land control and products. Yet the fact remains that Japan has kept her promise in discouraging emigration, and there are not so many Japanese in California as a few years ago. But whatever legislation California desired to correct existing evils could and should have been drawn with due recognition of the treaty obligations of our government. It is universally recognized that a treaty by the national government with a foreign power is "the supreme law of the land," not to be impaired or invalidated by the independent act of any State or States. This principle has been upheld by the United States Supreme Court in practically all cases where the law-making power of an individual State has come into conflict with an international treaty. Besides, there are existing laws in eight other States which make it impossible for Orientals to own land in this country until they declare their intention of becoming citizens—a privilege which they have not yet been accorded by the States in question, since they are neither of white nor African descent. This, though perfectly well understood, is not specifically stated in the laws referred to, nor was it necessary that it should be stated. A bill in similar terms, if passed by the California legislature, would have excited no adverse comment here, nor would it have given the Japanese "jingoes" an opportunity to arouse anti-American sentiment. One very essential point to be remembered is that no power is conferred by the treaty of 1911 giving the Japanese the right to hold land here.

Back of the whole question at issue, there is to be considered our good faith with a Power with which we have always been on terms of friendship. The national honor is involved. President Wilson in his messages to Governor Johnson and the California legislature has emphasized this and has appealed to the wisdom and sense of honor and justice of the Western State to do nothing that would impair the good faith of the nation, as would be the case were a bill passed discriminating against Japan. He has received the assurance of Governor Johnson that nothing will be done to impair treaty rights. Secretary of State Bryan goes to Sacramento to explain more fully the administration view, and we may reasonably hope that what oratory alone may be unable to do, a sound exposition of constitutional law will accomplish. We cannot but believe that all of these efforts to induce calm reflection and a wiser policy will have the desired effect and that the bill in its ultimate form will prove unobjectionable. Governor Johnson, who wields the veto power of the State, has expressed this confident expectation and we may regard him as speaking with authority for his people when he gives the assurance that a majority of the legislators have no desire "to embarrass our own government or be offensive to any one."

The Value of a Name

OUR brethren of the Episcopal Church are still vigorously engaged in discussing the proposition for changing the name, "Protestant Episcopal," although there has been a strong protest against a change. The discussion has developed some interesting peculiarities. Some, like Rev. William T. Manning of Trinity, New York, have come out boldly in favor of dropping the word "Protestant" from the legal title of the church for the reason that it puts it "in the light of a modern denomination instead of as a part of the ancient historic Catholic Church." "Why," he asks, "should any one to-day fight for the word 'Protestant'? It reflects the spirit of a bygone age. We have progressed beyond it." In sharp contrast with this radical view is the opinion expressed in the Churchman (the official organ of the denomination) in an article by Thomas Nelson Page, who gravely sounds a warning that the effect of the present controversy may be to split the church in two. "I for one," he writes, "shall not be led out of the Protestant Episcopal Church. It is endeared to me by too many sacred associations. But if I leave I shall not stop on the way. I know where the path leads. . . . A portion will go—perhaps a considerable portion; but they will find that a considerable portion also hold the plain declaration of Protestantism in such reverent regard that they will have only split the church. At the end of every one of these uncandid attempts certain of the disappointed leaders perform a little pilgrimage to Rome—and that is where they ought to be." There are doubtless many who will agree with Mr. Page's view and who hold that there are problems of far greater importance in every Christian denomination to-day than a mere change of name. There are many urgent calls upon the energies of the church demanding the full use of all its resources and activities, and upon which it should concentrate its efforts with a view to the advancement of Christ's kingdom. The name in dispute is one that is honored everywhere. Why then prosecute an attempt at change, if it threatens to result in dissensions and possibly in disruption?

When Mayors Go to School

THAT distinguished citizen of Philadelphia, Mayor Rudolph Blankenburg, has injected a new feature in municipal government which promises to enliven the monotony of official business in the near future. He has decided that he and several of his associates shall go back to school for a season, in order that they may study the problems of civic government for the benefit of the citizens to whom they are responsible. Mayor Blankenburg, whose public career has been marked by the spirit of practical reform, believes that a course of lectures at the University of Wisconsin will enable him to overcome some of the difficulties he has encountered and will give him a better chance to cope successfully with the opposition that has made itself felt in the city council when he has lifted the reform standard for civic betterment. There are other mayors who might benefit by following his example. Every city should be governed on business principles, and it would be in the nature of a public blessing if all mayors and their associates, including, of cou city councils, should be converted to this view a be made to realize that honesty, economy and e ciency are the real test of a successful administ tion.

An "Extraordinary Utterance"

THAT is what a press notice calls the follow remark in Mr. J. P. Morgan's testament:

> I commit my soul into the hands of my Saviour in full confidence that, having redeemed it and washed it in his most precious blood, he will present it faultless before the throne of my heavenly Father; and I entreat my children to maintain and defend, at all hazard, and at any cost of personal sacrifice, the blessed doctrine of the complete atonement for sin through the blood of Jesus Christ, once offered, and through that alone.

Joy and sadness are striving for the mastery one's heart as one gazes pensively at this br newspaper item: joy, because of the noble conf sion, by the great American financier, of the car nal and most consolatory truth of the Christi faith; sadness, because this truth, or its utteran under the attending circumstances, should be p nounced "extraordinary and striking." How tr have both Mr. Morgan and the reporter spoken! more natural sentiment can occupy the mind of dying Christian than the thought of the Saviou redeeming agony. With the eye of faith rivet upon the Man of Sorrows, stricken, smitten of G and afflicted, because he bore our sins and w bruised for our iniquities—with the eye of fa peering in rapt and grateful admiration into t mystery of his vicarious death, the dying Christi makes the riven side of Jesus the cleft in the Ro of Ages where his fluttering soul seeks shelter li a bird before the oncoming tempest, and is safe fr any real harm. For Jesus has said: "He that l lieveth in me, though he were dead, yet shall live." Thus did Paul Gerhardt propose to die. his paraphrase of the seventh passion-greeting St. Bernhard—the famous "O bleeding head, a wounded"—the last two stanzas read thus:

When hence I must betake me,
Lord, do not thou depart!
Oh, nevermore forsake me,
When death is at my heart!
When soul and body languish,
Oh, leave me not alone,
But take away mine anguish
By virtue of thine own.

Be thou my consolation
And shield when I must die;
Remind me of thy passion,
When my last hour draws nigh.
My eyes shall then behold thee,
Upon thy cross shall dwell,
My heart by faith enfold thee.
Who dieth thus, dies well.

A dying confession of such a character from person in the position of Mr. Morgan—his days earth having certainly been filled to the brim wi secular thought and earthly business—is extreme rare. Why should it be so? There is no va reason why the average man of affairs of this wo should live a Christless life and die a Christl death.

Mr. Morgan's testamentary utterance concerni the great Gospel panacea against death is the lo liest bequest of all the bequests he made. Let us share in it, and by our joint confession of the sa truths aid his children and heirs in carrying o this greatest trust which their father confided their courageous keeping.

Great Mental Clinic Opened

MORE than one hundred authorities on medicine, some of them from foreign countries, assembled in Baltimore the afternoon of April 16 at the opening of the nry Phipps Psychiatric Clinic, a new unit of ins Hopkins Hospital, for the treatment and udy of every phase of mental disder. Mr. Henry Phipps gave 500,000 to make the clinic possi-. The principal address, on ecialism in General Hospitals, s delivered by Sir William Osler Oxford University, who was ought over to this country on rpose to deliver the message. William laid especial emphasis on the need of "mental nurses," d said they would be an impor-t part of the new clinic. A ban-et was given in Mr. Phipps's nor at night by the Johns Hop-ns University trustees, assisted a committee including Governor ldsborough and Mayor Preston. this racing age, with its strug-es of competition, many fall down the roadway of life, disabled in dy and mind. But science, and ecially that of medicine, has ved swifter than our rapidly vancing civilization, and the unded have been picked up by e hand of medical skill and of arity and nursed and put back on e roadway of life again. Dis-ses of the mind have been an alarming symptom our modern times. The nervous and mental eckage has been more rapid than our ability to air it. The new clinic in Baltimore is a long p in the right direction and the wisdom and con-ence and affection of the country will continue in-easingly to care for those afflicted with any kind of ntal disorders. The influence of mind over mind d of mind over body in curative processes is one the most interesting and important subjects of dern scientific thought. The soul, the highest rm of created being known, is sick with sin. rist came as a physician to cure it. His treat-nt of the leper is an example of his curative wer over body and soul.

And Jesus put forth his hand, and touched him, saying, I 1; be thou clean. And immediately his leprosy was cleansed. (att. 8: 3.)

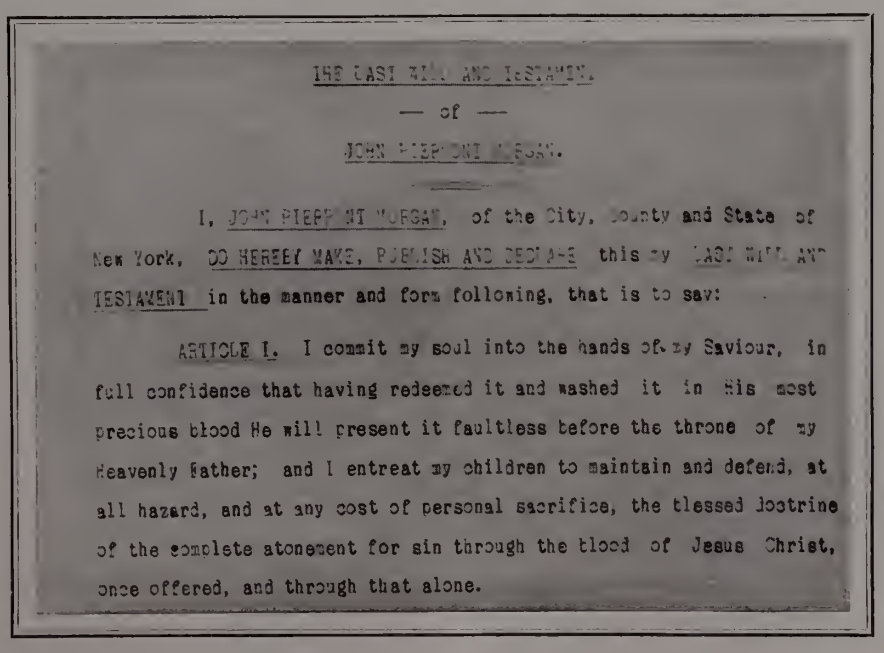
J. Pierpont Morgan's Will

HE will of the late John Pierpont Morgan has attracted the attention of the world because of e very remarkable confession of faith which is ntained in its first article. The heading and the ticle that has attracted so much attention are produced on this page. In other articles the te banker disposed of an estate timated at a value of from $75,000,-0 to $125,000. He provided for s wife, daughters, and other rela-ves, for house and other servants, r employees in his banking houses; gave $100,000 to the Protestant piscopal Church, and $500,000 to e ministerial endowment fund of . George's Episcopal Church of ew York City, of which he had for any years been the leading officer. is son, John Pierpont Morgan, he ade the residuary legatee, and the lk of the mammoth fortune falls to his hands. To the son he also queathed his art treasures, said to worth $50,000,000, with the sug-stion, amounting to a direction, so place them that the American blic might have the enjoyment and nefit of them. All the daily pa-rs gave special emphasis to the in-oductory article, declaring Mr. organ's supreme faith in Christ's tonement. This man, who gave imself up to the activities and suc-ss of the business world as few men the nation ever did, is found to ave been in vital contact with the piritual world, and his heart, out of hich all the issues of life come, was one with Christ, with Christ on the cross. His great love for his Episcopal denomination was known, as was his devotion to St. George's, his local church; his love for the poor and unfortunate and large and constant benefactions to them were a matter of general knowledge, but his modesty had concealed somewhat his personal devotion to Christ and His cross, which was the chief inspiration of his life and his sure hope of heaven. In the fundamentals of his faith and the prime motives of his life he caught the spirit of the apostle:

For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified. (I Cor. 2: 2.)



THE LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

— of —

JOHN PIERPONT MORGAN.

I, JOHN PIERPONT MORGAN, of the City, County and State of New York, DO HEREBY MAKE, PUBLISH AND DECLARE this my LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT in the manner and form following, that is to say:

ARTICLE I. I commit my soul into the hands of my Saviour, in full confidence that having redeemed it and washed it in His most precious blood He will present it faultless before the throne of my Heavenly Father; and I entreat my children to maintain and defend, at all hazard, and at any cost of personal sacrifice, the blessed doctrine of the complete atonement for sin through the blood of Jesus Christ, once offered, and through that alone.

THE FIRST PARAGRAPH OF THE MORGAN WILL

The Maxims of Napoleon

GREAT interest has been aroused among students and historians by the recent publication of some hitherto unknown maxims dictated by Napoleon while a prisoner at St. Helena. In speaking of the magical influence of his personal presence over his soldiers, he says: "When I used to say, 'Unfurl your flags, the moment has come,' the French soldiers simply shook with eagerness. At such a moment nothing seemed impossible to me. The Thirty-second Demibrigade would have died for me, because after Lonato I wrote, 'The Thirty-second was there and I was at ease.'" How much more influence a greater Leader than Napoleon has upon his soldiers of the Cross as he passes among their ranks, calling upon them to unfurl their flags and expressing his confidence in their loyalty and love! St. Helena gave Napoleon time for maxims and for religious meditation, which he greatly improved. There he fed his starved soul with self-examination, faith, and communion with Christ, of which he makes such distinct and grateful mention in his published sayings. He lost the Alps but looked toward Mount Zion. As Europe slipped from his fingers he reached out his hand to secure the heavenly Canaan. He lost an earthly kingdom; he conquered a greater empire within himself. He lost the crown of France; he gained a crown of immortality. The Scripture, in speaking of Christ's superlative greatness, places him

Far above all principality, and power, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come. (Eph. 1: 21.)

An Illustrious Teacher

THE Secretary of State made his début as the teacher of a Bible class in Washington a Sunday or two ago when he addressed a meeting of men in the Columbia Theater under the auspices of the Christian Endeavor Society. Mr. Bryan's theme was "The Larger Life." He resented the implication that a man leading a spiritual life becomes narrow, saying that "If a man felt his spiritual starvation as keenly as he does physical starvation, or if his spiritual leanness showed as plainly as physical leanness, it would be easier to give him spiritual food." Everything that lives feeds: every plant, animal, man, or mind. The fields of earth do not grow any food good enough to feed the soul. God furnishes that from the harvests on the other side of the river, with truth and his own life of love. The necessity for the recognition of the condition of leanness and starvation for the sustenance of the spiritual is illustrated in the return of the prodigal, which began when he saw his condition, and said:

I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father. (Luke 15: 17, 18.)

A Missionary Martyr

MR. WILLIAM W. BORDEN, the wealthy young Yale graduate, who was preparing to preach the Gospel to the Mohammedans in China, died at Cairo, Egypt, on April 9, of spinal meningitis, which he contracted while nursing a missionary. He was the son of the late William Borden, a Chicago banker. At Yale he was the president of the Phi Beta Kappa Society, and was active in football and baseball and rowed on the winning 1909 club crew in his junior year. He was a member of the board of directors of the National Bible Institute of this city, a trustee of the Moody Bible Institute, Chicago, a member of the council of the China Inland Mission, Philadelphia, a member of the executive committee of the Nile Mission Press, and a founder of the Yale-Hope Mission of New Haven. Mr. Borden was graduated from Princeton Theological Seminary in May, 1912, and was studying at Cairo in preparation for his work as a missionary, upon which he expected to enter next year. The death of a young man like this is a providence which is difficult to interpret. With his splendid lineage, liberal education, upright character, and spiritual consecration, with the material means of carrying into execution any plan determined upon, he was just ready to live, and yet he died. This suggests the truth that death cannot hurt such a person as young Borden, and that his equipment for this life will serve him in the activities and ministries of the life into which he has gone. It may be that this young man by his love for his Lord, his widespread generosity, his great plans for the future, has done as much as many ordinary lives in the establishment of Christ's kingdom. The giving of his life with his heart for his Saviour suggests:

Hereby perceive we the love of God, because he laid down his life for us, and we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren. (I John 3: 16.)

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, May 11. Acts 2: 1-12. The Holy Spirit came like wind. It was as the creation of a new air, a new atmosphere, a new climate. Professor Huxley said that if only the bleak little island of Britain could be possessed by tropical airs we should be amazed what a bewildering plenitude of tropical seeds would awake out of their graves, and troop forth in luxuriant strength and beauty. They were waiting for climate. And the Holy Spirit brings heavenly climate to the soul, and latent powers of perception and affection spring into vigorous life and power. "The wind bloweth where it listeth," and there is a resurrection as of the earth from its wintry sleep.

And the Holy Ghost came as fire. "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire." He came to create pure fervors and enthusiasms. Consciences are burning dimly: he comes to feed them into radiant flame. Holy desires are growing lukewarm: he comes to inspire them with new zeal. Affections are smoldering: he comes to rekindle them into passionate devotion. It is his gracious purpose to make the entire life a holy shrine with its altar burning with glowing and hallowed fire.

MONDAY, May 12. Genesis 42: 1-17. It was through the instrumentality of a famine that the alienated brethren were brought together again. When Joseph was sold into Egypt his brothers hoped and thought that they would never see him again. And now they also are driven into Egypt, not by slave-bands, but by the tyranny of hunger. The Lord God drove them where they had driven Joseph! Shall we say that the great Shepherd was using his dogs on the scattered flock, and that the name of one of the dogs was Famine?

God frequently makes use of severe ministries to accomplish gracious ends. The shepherd's dogs gather the flock to the shelter and security of the fold: and God uses more fearful experiences of life to gather us into the vast sheltering goodness of his grace. Sometimes he uses sickness, sometimes death, sometimes the dark visitants of sheer disappointment and defeat.

When Joseph was sold it seemed to his brothers that the whole affair was over. No, the Lord was at work. When they were at work in Canaan, attending to their flocks, the net was being woven which was to catch their feet. We are so foolish as to assume that even God has gone to sleep! He "neither slumbers nor sleeps." He is wide awake, and his decrees are running in spite of our mischief and our sin.

TUESDAY, May 13. Genesis 42: 18-28. "We are verily guilty concerning our brother." In going into Egypt they rediscovered their sin. They thought their deed was dead and buried, but now it has a dreadful resurrection. They went into Egypt for corn and they found their consciences. "Be sure your sin will find you out." The way of our life may wind and wind, and every winding may seem to bring us into new comfort and peace, but some day, and perhaps suddenly, the way will turn, and we shall find ourselves face to face with our old sin.

It was comparatively easy to sell a brother, it was impossible to escape God. We may get rid of the one, we cannot get rid of the Other. "If I make my bed in hell, he is there." Yes, if I make money in the realm of the evil one, selling even my brother for a handful of silver, "He is there," and he will not leave me, and the remembrance of that money will at length burn into my conscience like "a consuming fire."

It is well, therefore, to remember that when sin is done it is not done with. It can only be destroyed through penitence, and confession, and the cleansing energies of God's redeeming love. He only can deal with sin. "Though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool." "As for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away."

WEDNESDAY, May 14. Genesis 42: 29-38. Let us not forget the ray of light which Reuben's character throws across the story. He is always chivalrous and magnanimous. His impulses are like crystal springs. The brothers are sullen and moody, full of plot and mischief. He is frank and candid, full of courage, and not fearing to stand alone. He is one to himself!

Let us thank God for the man who stands alone in the crisis, and who raises his solitary protest amidst the popular clamor. When the history of things is all unveiled it will be seen how great a part the single protest has made in keeping the atmosphere clean, and in preserving the life and vitality of the social conscience.

But if we are to be brave protestants we must feed on strong food. If we are to wield the angel's sword we must feed on angel's meat. We must have "the bread of heaven." We must be "strengthened by his spirit in the inner man." We must be "strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus." Fine courage is a matter of high relations. If we "wait on the Lord" we shall be "of good courage"; and clothed in the "whole armor of God" we shall be "able to stand, and, having done all, to stand."

THURSDAY, May 15. Proverbs 12: 13-28. "The tongue of the wise is health." Our doctors often test our physical condition by the state of our tongue. With another and deeper significance the tongue is also the register of our condition. Our words are a perfect index of our moral and spiritual health. If our words are unclean and untrue our souls are assuredly sickly and diseased. A perverse tongue is never allied with a sanctified heart. And, therefore, everyone may apply a clinical test to his own life: "What is the character of my speech? What do my words indicate? What do they suggest as to the depths and background of the soul?"

God delighted in truthful lips. Right words are fruit from the tree of life. The Lord walketh in his garden, and the fruit of holy lips is sweet unto his taste. But untrue words are as rotten fruit offered in the sacrifice of the temple. What is more abhorrent than putrid fruit? "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord!"

It is only the lips that have been purified with flame from the holy altar of God that can offer words that are pleasing unto him.

Take my lips and let them be Filled with messages from thee.

FRIDAY, May 16. Colossians 3: 12-17. True forgiveness is a very strong, and clean, and masculine virtue. There is a counterfeit forgiveness which is unworthy of the name. It is full of "buts," and "ifs," and "maybes," and "peradventures." It moves with reluctance, it offers with averted face, it takes back with one hand what it gives with the other. It forgives, but it "cannot forget." It forgives, but it "can never trust again." It forgives, but "things can never be the same as they were." What kind of forgiveness is this? It is the mercy of the police-court. It is the remission of penalty, not the glorious "abandon" of grace! It is cold "don't do it again," not the compassionate good-will of the Lord.

"Even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye." That is to be our motive, and that is to be our measure. We are to forgive because Christ forgave us. The glorious memory of his grace is to make us gracious. His tender, healing words to us are to redeem our speech from all harshness.

And we are to forgive as Christ forgave us. We are to have no reserve—no smoldering fire of resentment. Resentment is to be changed into good-will, frank and generous, and filled with the grace of the Lord.

SATURDAY, May 17. Luke 17: 3-10. We are always inclined to set a limit to our moral obligations. We wish, as we say, "to draw a line somewhere." We want to appoint a definite place where obligation ceases, and where the moral strain may be released. The apostle Peter wished his Master to draw such a line in the matter of forgiveness. "Lord, how oft shall I forgive? Till seven times?" He wanted a tiny moral rule which he could apply to his brother's conduct. He would number the transgressions one by one, he would count the acts of forgiveness one by one, and then, when the sacred seven had been completed—? He would throw obligation to the winds, and allow the fire of resentment and revenge to burn without restraint!

Not so the Lord. Our Master tells his disciple that in those spiritual realms relations are not governed by arithmetic. We cannot, by counting, measure off our obligations. Our repeated acts of forgiveness never bring us nearer to the freedom of revenge. We cannot, by being good, obtain a license to be evil. The fact of the matter is, if our goodness is of genuine quality every act will more strongly dispose us to further goodness. It is the counterfeit element in our goodness that inclines us to the opposite camp. It is when our forgiveness is tainted that we anticipate the "sweetness" of revenge.

OWING AND REAPING LIFE'S HARVEST*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

HE dearth of foodstuffs in Canaan caused anxiety among the sons of Jacob because their immediate families numbered seventy persons. "But Jacob saw there was corn in Egypt." (Gen. 42: 1.) He learned of it through passing caravans and from sons who had gone thither for food. So he said to his , "Why do ye look one upon another [in dismay]? Be- l, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt; get you n thither, and buy for us from thence, that we may live, not die." Jacob and his sons were rich in cattle and ds; these, however, were rather embarrassing riches in es of famine. But they were able quickly to fit out a avan of asses. After long days of journeying they ap- red at one of the government granaries in which corn been stored by Joseph against the time of famine.

nd when they saw the ruler they "bowed them- es before him with their faces to the earth." en. 42: 6.) They never guessed that they were bowing heir brother Joseph. They had not seen him for more n twenty years, when they had sold him as a boy slave the Midianites. Joseph had every appearance of the h Egyptian official that he was. His head was shaven l covered with a wig of long curls, very heavy. He was d in voluminous garments as light as air. He wore the g's golden chain about his neck, and the king's ring of thority was upon his finger. Joseph knew his brothers, he was in no hurry to let them know that he did. He d in mind first to test them, that he might discover ether or not they were as little changed in character as y were in appearance. Joseph proceeded in a diplo- tic way, as becoming a government officer; he charged m with being spies. "We are true men, and no spies," y replied, and they declared that they had come for no l purpose, but only "to buy food." But the diplomatic seph pressed them harder, repeating his charge that they re spies. This they disclaimed by telling the ruler out the family to which they belonged. "We are the ns of one man in Canaan, our youngest brother is with r father, and one is not" (not alive). They meant Jo- ph, for they supposed, of course, he was not living. "You st prove what you say," replied the diplomatic ruler, "so will have you all put in prison as spies until that young other is brought before me." After three days the ruler d another proposition to make to them, as he feared the milies of his brothers might starve to death. He said, ou may all return to your home with the food you have ught, excepting one of you, who must remain in the ison until you all come back, bringing your young brother ith you." The brothers talked with each other about w cruel they had been to Joseph, and they were sure eir father would not let them take Benjamin to bring m to Egypt. They thought the ruler was an Egyptian d so could not understand what they were saying. But seph understood every word, and he saw, too, that they ere very unhappy about the wrong they had done him. till he was diplomatic and he took one of them, Simeon, nd sent him back to prison until his brothers should re- rn, bringing their young brother Benjamin with them.

Another act of diplomacy was to have the money which ey had paid for the corn put back into their sacks. oseph wanted to see if they were as fond of money as ey were when they sold him to the Midianites. They did ot discover the money in their sacks until after they had eached their home in Canaan. And when they saw it ey were afraid, afraid the ruler of Egypt would say that ey were thieves as well as spies. They determined to carry the money back when they should go again to buy food and to take Benjamin with them.

Do you think they would have been any less afraid if they had known that the ruler of Egypt was really their own brother Joseph? We believe they would have been more than ever afraid, because they would have supposed that he would have had them killed for trying to kill him when he was a boy.

Those brothers of Joseph had sowed the seeds of cruelty and they were reaping the harvest. There was nothing, however, in what Joseph said or did as ruler of Egypt that was in the spirit of "paying them back." His investigation was solely for the purpose of discovering whether or not they had turned from their evil ways and become good men, whether or not they were to be trusted with opportunities that he might give them for larger life. One good symptom was that their consciences troubled them. To have a dead conscience is to be in the most hopeless condition. The story is told of a prince who had a wonderful ring which pricked his finger whenever he was doing anything wrong. It was given him to help him always to keep upright and good, and he was told that so long as he wore it he would prosper. At first he set a great store by his ring, but he afterwards got vexed with it, because by its pricking it kept him from doing many things which he wanted. At last he utterly lost patience with it and threw it away one day. He did not try to find it again. and as a result he became a very bad man. This is an allegory of a man who killed his conscience.

Henry Ward Beecher uttered the following warning against deadening conscience: "Take a shield and cast a spear upon it, and it will leave in it one great dent; prick it all over with a million little needle shafts and they will take the polish from it far more than the piercing of the spear. So it is not so much the great sins which take the freshness from our consciences as the numberless petty faults which we are all the while committing." But a dulled conscience or a slain conscience has a way of coming to life again, and so there is the hell of remorse in this world and in the beyond.

No doubt during those more than twenty years since they had so cruelly treated Joseph those brothers had often congratulated themselves in getting rid of him so easily. They were no longer troubled by their father's favoritism, nor by the ambitious dreams of Joseph. The whole affair was a forbidden subject, it was a closed incident. But how terrible was the awakening when they found themselves in danger of being apprehended for thieves and murderous spies by the ruler of Egypt! But better far to have so rude an awakening than to have none at all while there is still opportunity to retrieve the past.

Besides the evil consciences, or no consciences at all, which the brothers of Joseph cultivated, we place the wise words of William Byron Furbish in his book, The Boy Problem. He says: "The principal thing a child has to do morally before he is twelve years old is to grow a conscience. The principal thing after that is to get power to use his will. I would be glad, if I were sure it were a good one, to be able to button my moral code around my child, knowing that it would probably protect him until he was big enough to outgrow it; but I would much rather be sure that he had learned to speak the truth in his heart. If a boy can always do that, it is about all one ought to expect of him before he is twelve. If he obeys me, that is discipline; but if he learns to obey himself, that is character." But after all, there is only one way to develop a stainless conscience; it is to say, "I will try by the help of Jesus to give up everything that is sinful. I will try to be more like Jesus every day." In that kind of soil the conscience can neither degenerate nor die.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—MR. DAVID S. FRY, of Newport, Pa., quotes order the objections that were recently made the Round Table to the graded lesson sys- em, and replies in a letter which is, in part, s follows:

(1) "'Mothers don't have time to teach sixteen or even six" children different les- ons.' Granted. The graded lessons were put nto operation for those children whose moth- rs do not teach them the Sunday school lesson efore they go to the Sunday school on Sunday. n this degenerate day this class of mothers orm about 90 per cent. of motherhood, espe- ially as concerns the smaller children. But or the mother who is anxious to teach her hildren something of the Sunday school lesson efore going to Sunday school the graded les- ons make it easy, for the lessons for the same ear and grade repeat themselves, so that the mother has to learn any particular lesson only once.

(2) "'Superintendents can't help all teach- ers in so many grades, all with different les- sons.' Neither do they help with the uniform. The lower grades of the Sunday school are habitually neglected by the superintendent or any one else chiefly concerned with adults. In little antiquated Washington if you have super- intendents of departments in addition to su- perintendents of the whole school, these super- intendents of departments and their teachers will convene weekly for what is known as a graded union.

(3) "'Papers publishing comments on the lessons cannot cover the ground when so many lessons are to be discussed.' No need to. The graded lessons are meant for children of such age that not one out of a thousand or ten thou- sand reads the comments in the papers, and so far as the teachers are concerned they have helps far superior to what any newspaper scribbler could furnish. There is no danger from this source that Dr. Crafts and other Sunday school lesson writers will lose their jobs.

(4) "'When pupils away from home can fit right into Sunday school anywhere only on uniform system.' Graded lesson pupils are always studying the Bible, and no matter what Sunday school they enter if they teach the Bible in that school the pupil will feel at home.

(5) "'Graded lessons too pedagogical for untrained minds.' Why not pedagogical? It is only in this way they can learn to love the Bible, while at the same time imbibing life truths from it. With uniform lessons Bibles are conspicuous for their absence. In graded lessons the use of the Bible is imperative."

—HERE AGAIN WE FIND some things that be- long to good teaching, both in the uniform and graded series, are assumed to belong to the latter only, such as the use of Bibles in the classes, which the best superintendents pro- moted before the graded series was ever thought of. The Religious Education Associa- tion, which was founded in part to promote the graded series, is doing most excellent work in other ways. One of the new ways which is mentioned in the Continent in con- nection with its last convention, though it may not have been mentioned there at all, is the request of the Board of Education of Phila- delphia that the Sunday schools set apart one Sunday in each year as "vocation day," putting up to the young people of each con- gregation the solemnity of choosing a life work in the fear of God with the question thrust upon them what profession or occupation each proposes to choose for a life work, and the deeper thought that each one will at any rate attempt to make his life useful so that the world will be better for his living in it. Surely every public and private school as well as every Sunday school may well have a "vocation day" when this truth is pressed home by teachers and by visiting speakers and in discussions among the pupils themselves.

WHAT IS "TRUE CONVERSION?"

MORE VIEWS BY PASTORS OF VARIOUS DENOMINATIONS DEFINING THE NATURE OF THE NEW BIRTH

FEW questions of a spiritual character have aroused greater interest than the discussion on "True Conversion" in the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Pastors of all denominations have contributed to the general enlightenment on this vital topic. To-day we give another instalment of letters on the subject:

"Conversion is Nothing Less Than a New Creation," Writes Rev. A. B. Simpson.

CONVERSION may be regarded as a spiritual change of heart and life, transforming its subject from a life of selfishness and sin to a life of righteousness and true service for God and man. On the divine side it is the result of a supernatural operation of the Holy Spirit creating a new spiritual life and described in Ezekiel 36: 26 as the imparting to us of a new heart and new spirit, and in John 3: 3 as a regeneration or being born from above. On the human side it begins with an act of repentance and decision for God, for which every sinful man is held responsible. This is implied in the words of the apostle Peter in Acts 3: 19, "Repent ye, therefore, and be converted," or literally "repent and convert."

It is more than ethical culture, or self-improvement, or reformation of character and conduct. It is nothing less than a new creation, and therefore we read in II Cor. 5: 17 "Therefore if any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new."

"Conversion a Change from a State of Wrath to a State of Grace," Writes Professor Dau, St. Louis.

CONVERSION is used in a wide, and a narrow, or strict, meaning. The etymology of the term implies that it is a turning, and Acts 26: 18 shows that a "turning from darkness to light, from the power of Satan to God," is intended. Such turning is effected when a person, on the one hand, acknowledges and repents of his sin (hence by a state of contriteness), and on the other hand, when he believes in the reconciliation effected for him by Jesus Christ. Contrition, produced by an earnest and conscientious application of the holy law of God, and faith, derived from the Gospel, are therefore the constituent parts of conversion in the wider sense. But very often conversion is used as a synonym for regeneration, or the new birth, and signifies the quickening of a person, who is by nature dead in trespasses and sins, into a new, spiritual life. This is effected by the kindling of faith in men; for it is those who believe in Christ as their Saviour who are declared to have been "born again." Conversion in the wider sense is an action proceeding through grades, or stages, and of longer or shorter duration. Conversion in the strict sense, or the bestowal of faith, the actual transfer from a state of wrath into a state of grace, is an instantaneous act of the Holy Spirit. Conversion is entirely a work of grace, wrought in the sinner, not by him.

"Conversion Is a New Life, Dominated by New Motives," Writes Rev. C. L. Goodell.

CONVERSION, to me, is a change of heart. Once men thought the heavens were geocentric—that it was this little earth of ours that held compelling authority over sun, moon and stars. There came a time when all men realized that this was not true—that the sun was the center of our system, and that this earth played but a minor part in the great solar system. A man naturally is inclined to feel that the things which are seen and handled are the important things; that his own will and his own advantage must dominate everything. When a man comes to realize that this is not true; that our obligation to God is supreme; that "in him we live and move and have our being"; that he has made us for himself and that we are restless until we rest in him—then he acknowledges a new center of being, a new purpose for his life. When a man measures what he does by the will of God and the service of men he is a converted man.

The method of the conversion is another question. It may come to him with tremendous upheaval or it may come as quietly as the day breaks. It may come in an hour which he notes upon the clock and which is the mother of many a happy anniversary, or it may come little by little so that he cannot tell himself what day, or week, or month he enters into the new experience. Nor can an outsider always judge of the depth or reality of the experience. In any event it must be true that the things which he once selfishly loved have lost their charm and the things which he once hated because they crossed his natural desires and selfish impulses he now loves because he finds that they minister to his spiritual growth. A new life has come to him because new motives dominate him.

I have only touched, you will see, upon what I think is the essence of conversion. I have not considered at all the question of whether a person may come to God so early in life as to never have any sensation of selfish domination. That is entirely another question.

"The Hand of God Touches and Changes the Heart," Writes Professor Fritschel.

IN THE life of every true Christian there is one and the same experience—various and manifold as may be the time and manner—that a power and influence from outside enters into his life. The hand of God touches the human heart and changes it. This experience is the fundamental change by which man is rescued from sin and damnation and made a child of grace and salvation. Two component parts constitute conversion, namely, repentance and faith. Repentance looks downward and backwards. Through the law God produces a true knowledge of man's sins, sinfulness and the consequences; through the Gospel he produces a true knowledge and acceptance of God's grace in Christ Jesus. Repentance alone (cf. Judas) is not conversion; faith alone is not conversion. But repentance and faith taken together as a unit are that which the Word of God designates as conversion.

"Conversion is Turning to God by the Holy Spirit's Help," Writes Rev. M. J. MacLeod.

CONVERSION is a turning to God by the help of the Holy Spirit, and so looking at life through the eyes of God in Jesus Christ, that the soul learns to love what He loves and hate what He hates.

tocrats or clases privilegiadas of ay. Their descent and claims to ility will not bear too close investi-
on. Lerdo de Tejado said: "The -of-arms of ——— should bear a ttle, of ——— a trowel, of ——— ashtub." This class are bitter haters oppressors of the lower and mid-classes. Without noble blood, noble incts, or a noble education, and money the fruit of violence, they to be feared. He who seeks to ele-

he twentieth century is not lacking political intrigues and religious inrance. These have always had rii at their command when not the ke or the cord.

Madero sought to better the condi-
n of the workingman. He held con-ences with capital and labor. The ary of the workingmen and girls
s increased five per cent. Capital, the energetic attitude of labor, and president's support, had been ced to yield, but it hid awful rancor its foul heart.

No sooner was Madero deposed than arge factory in Pueblo cut ten per
t. of the salaries of its employees.
mplaint was made, and capital reed, "Take what is given and be ateful; the day will come when you ll be glad to work for a crust."
bor replied by burning the factory.
rong? Yes, to be sure; but when pital starves labor it cannot expect employees to be better than brutes.

The titles of the great hacendados
e none too clean, and none too lid. It was truthfully said by an ile of good family and splendid rning: "In Mexico a man has no ht to think; no right to possess, no right to vote, no right to live." He spoke of the policy pursued by Porfirio Diaz. Madero listened to the disinherited.

During the dictadura the hacendados violently despoiled the indigenas of their lands. These on complaining received no legal support, and if they insisted on their claims, were threatened with imprisonment and worse things. A rich Spaniard of this capital was one of Madero's most implacable enemies because certain lands he had wrenched from the poor, they having proved their titles, were returned to them by President Madero.

"No right to think, no right to live," seems to be the policy of the present administration, since not more than five days ago (from the date of writing) forty men found talking together were accused of plotting and shot ere the morning light.

Madero brought upon himself the hatred of the Catholic party by permitting Doña Suz Zaragon, a Spanish liberal, to speak in public on the baleful and degrading influence of the priests. A group of dames of the alta aristocracia dressed in their richest attire went to Madero, and in a haughty manner protested against his permitting a woman who professed such ideas to speak in public. Madero received the ladies with small ceremony, and declared his intention of protecting liberty of speech. They retired highly offended, calling him a low vulgar fellow unworthy of a presidential chair.

Although the constitution gives equal political rights to all male citizens, suffrage was for thirty years a farce. Madero taught the people their rights.

Is the cause of the people lost? No, never. "Right even on the scaffold sways the future."

Should surrounding Christian nations take no part in present events? Intervention would not mend matters; yet by some other significant act Christian nations should prove to the actual government, founded on treachery, fraud, and murder, that its mask of hypocrisy is entirely too transparent, and its crimes are understood and condemned.

The rude soldiers, slaves of tyrants, destroyed the cross that ignorance and superstition, founded nevertheless on love, placed on the spot where Madero fell. He needs no visible cross. The government accorded him not the honors due to an ex-president. He needed not the empty roar of muskets over his grave. Madero gave his heart to the people, and in theirs he still lives.

for the entire clergy and Church of Rome in America by the Marian? Nor are we sure of understanding fully the Marian when it declares the Pope to have no divine right to interfere with our country in things purely political, and this because we are in doubt as to what Rome defines to be the limitations of the sphere of that morality of which the Pope is held to be the divinely infallible teacher, and wherein unconditional obedience must be rendered him by every faithful member of his church. And might we also ask the Marian to give us an authoritative statement as to the limitations of the authority of civil government, and especially what is that standard or norm by which, according to Rome, the state must be governed in all its legislation and the exercise of its every function? And finally may we ask the Marian to define for us that liberty which Rome sets forth as the only true liberty, which it is the duty of civil government to establish and maintain? Does the editor of the Marian agree or disagree with Pius IX and Leo XIII? And if he disagrees with these Popes what is his warrant, and why does he ask of us to accept his definition as the true representation of the Roman Catholic Church over and against that of these recent Popes?

Once more let us say that we are animated by no spirit of malice or animosity, and that nothing should give us greater delight than to have the proof furnished by an official and authoritative statement from the acknowledged head of the Roman Catholic Church that the Pope of Rome has no right, unless it be expressly delegated to him by any nation, to interfere with or exercise any supremacy over its civil and political affairs, and that the only right principle is that of complete separation of church and state. Such proof we eagerly await.

Among the Workers

—THE REV. ALAN PRESSLEY WILSON, 271 North Second Street, Lykens, Pa., has published a series of missionary poems for free distribution. Mr. Wilson will send copies of these inspiring appeals to any who will enclose return postage.

—AT SMITHFIELD, OHIO, the five evangelical churches have held a series of union services, led by the Rev. David M. Conn, of Sandwich, Ill., and M. F. Smith, of Hookstown, Pa., with the result that over a hundred new members were added to their rolls.

—THE UNION HIGH SCHOOL for boys at Wuhu, China, wishes to form a band this spring. Gifts of "instruments, new or old," can be sent to Rev. Z. C. Beals, 160 Warren Street, Boston, Mass., who will send them on to their Yangtse destination.

—ON PALM SUNDAY at the Kountze Memorial Church, Omaha, Neb., a class of 182 persons were confirmed, said to be the largest class ever received at one time in any Lutheran church in America. During Holy Week 114 others were received, making a total of 296 Easter accessions. Rev. Oliver D. Baltzly, D.D., is the pastor.

—A GOOD REPORT comes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of the work of "Jack" Lomberger, an evangelist who carries the Gospel among the mining and lumber camps of northern Minnesota and other localities of the Northwest. He was redeemed from a life of sin through the preaching and influence of Frank E. Higgins, the famous and beloved "sky pilot."

—IN THE BAHAMAS BAPTIST UNION are included pastors and churches in Eleuthera, San Salvador, Long Island, Exuma and Andros. The Rev. D. Wilshire, well known to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is general superintendent. The Bahamas Union is part of the Baptist Union of Great Britain and Ireland, and is also incorporated in the Baptist World's Alliance.

—THE FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY of the First Congregational Church of Woodhaven, L. I., on March 16-17, was a notable occasion. The first pastor was Rev. William James, who continued as pastor for thirty years. On November 2-3, 1890, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his pastorate was celebrated, and a purse of $250 presented to him. He built the first church, and at his retirement it had 214 members. There have been four pastors since, the present incumbent being Rev. Ray E. Butterfield. At the recent celebration Dr. James preached a sermon that was full of tender recollections of the church's early days and struggles.

SAPOLIO

You know that harsh, chemical cleaners give poor suds.

Try this: Lather your hands with Sapolio. Swish them back and forth through a bowl of warm water. See the rich suds form.

Now try the same with any other cleaning compound.

Where are the suds?

Of course, strong harsh compounds will remove dirt. (So will sand-paper and caustic soda.) But they give tins a dull, "frosted" surface. In time they grind off the tin coating. Then your tins rust. If you want tin-ware that shines like a mirror, use Sapolio. It contains no strong chemicals or coarse, injurious grit.

Rub a damp cloth on a cake of Sapolio. You then have a quick economical cleaner for tin-ware, enamel-ware, kitchen knives and forks, pots and kettles, dishes, woodwork and marble. Works without waste.

Our Spotless Town booklet tells more about Sapolio and more about Spotless Town. Write for it. Sent free.

When Dishes Break

Every good housekeeper knows the pang which comes with the crash of a broken dish.

Some china is so frail that it cracks or chips on the slightest provocation. Often it is difficult or impossible to replace the broken dishes, especially if the ware is made abroad. The consequence is an incomplete set, too good to throw away, and too small for practical use.

Homer Laughlin China is of such excellent texture that it does not break or chip easily. It stands the severe test of every day use remarkably well. Made in America, any pieces you may break can be easily replaced. You can always keep your china set complete, and that too, at a very moderate cost.

Thousands of people have found pleasure and profit in reading our free book on china making. Have you had your copy?

FROM TWELVE TO ONE

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

I GOT out of the elevator feeling strangely happy and in tune with the springtime. The chimes of Grace Church were ringing softly to the melody of a sweet old hymn and the sunlight was tinged with that golden glory that some sunlight does not possess. It really seemed a shame to eat, and yet I was unromantically hungry.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

But the glory of the wonderful day stopped right there, for one large drop of bitterness was in my cup of joy. I had to write as soon as I finished my luncheon, and the prospect did not please me. The springtime was too beautiful, the air too fresh and balmy and my mind was too full of dreams.

I went into the crowded restaurant and sat down in the only empty place, at a table with a young mother and her tiny daughter. The little girl was absorbing vanilla ice cream with a rapidity that astonished me until I heard her mother's voice say in tense, whispering tones:

"Hurry up, baby! I can't wait much longer—" and then again in a minute,

"I've got a lot to do, baby; eat just a little bit faster." Whereupon the child gulped down the last of the ice cream and was led, crimson-faced and choking, from the room.

An old man sat down at a table near mine; from the first glance I had of him I knew that he was cross and unpleasant, and when he spoke I found that his voice was even as I had imagined. Loudly, angrily, he called to the head waiter:

"Hey, you, get somebody to take my order!" and when at last a protesting little white-robed girl was produced to serve him, he snarled:

"Took you long enough, didn't it? Why can't you be here at your place?"

Then he went into minute details about his dinner until the waitress was so confused that I doubt if she remembered her own name. His manner was in marked contrast to the sweet way of a woman, well past middle age, who sat at the next table. The tired, white-faced girl who balanced a heavy tray looked almost rested when she received a charming smile and a "Thank you, dear," as she deposited her burden on the snowy cloth.

Three girls—attractive, light-hearted young women—sat down at my table and began to talk. They minded my presence not at all, and I soon became quite interested in their little conversation, for they were talking of love and ideals.

"I," said the tallest of the girls, as she pulled her chic little bonnet over her eyes, "I am never going to get married!" but she blushed as she spoke.

The next tallest girl looked up quickly.

"You say that?" she asked, nonchalantly biting an olive, "but last night I saw—" She broke off meaningly as a scarlet, burning flush crept up over the cheeks of the first speaker. Then all three girls laughed together.

The smallest girl, a chubby, cunning little lady, raised her eyes from her plate:

"I think," she spoke softly, "that I will like getting married, now that my ideal has come along. I like to cook things, and wash dishes, and take care of a house, and oh, all sorts of things!"

The tallest girl spoke again:

"Yes, marry a man to work for him," she drawled; "not much!" But the smallest girl did not answer. Her mild blue eyes gazed far off into the distance, and one could tell that her thoughts were dancing madly between dainty wall papers and embroidered pillow-cases, and hemstitched tablecloths. And as I glanced down I saw the sparkle of a modest diamond on her left hand.

A party of schoolgirls drifted in, dressed in their prettiest clothes, and evidently ready for a matinée. Although they were attractive girls, probably from very good families, their laughter and conversation was a little too loud to be in good taste.

These girls, although they did not dream of it, afforded quite a lot of amusement to three attractive college men who were seated near them. I saw the boys whisper behind carefully lifted hands, and then one of them smiled broadly at the leader of the noisy newcomers.

The boys left before I did, and I heard one say as he passed my table: "Those children ought to be kept home. Why, they acted as if they had never seen a man before!"

And one of his companions answered, in perfectly serious vein: "If I had a daughter and she acted like that, I would make her mighty sorry for it!"

And at that moment a shrill sentence drifted from the girls' table and I caught this: "That tall blond one is awfully cute! I think I made quite a hit with him."

If the girls of that age only knew what disgust they caused perhaps they would be more careful.

I got up, and with a smile that was heartily returned by the girls at my table, I left the room and entered the going-down elevator. An old lady with soft, wavy hair, who stood beside me, was smiling dreamily as she glanced over the crowded, noisy throng. With an impulse to confide in some one, I turned to her.

"It's queer," I said, "isn't it? The different people, and everything." But here she surprised me. She, too, had been "seeing things."

"'All the world's a stage,'" she quoted, "'and all the men and women merely players.'"

MORE THAN EVER

Increased Capacity for Mental Labor Since Leaving Off Coffee.

Many former coffee drinkers who have mental work to perform, day after day, have found a better capacity and greater endurance by using Postum instead of coffee. An Ills. woman writes:

"I had drank coffee for about twenty years, and finally had what the doctor called 'coffee heart.' I was nervous and extremely despondent; had little mental or physical strength left, had kidney trouble and constipation.

"The first noticeable benefit derived from the change from coffee to Postum was the natural action of the kidneys and bowels. In two weeks my heart action was greatly improved and my nerves steady.

"Then I became less despondent, and the desire to be active again showed proof of renewed physical and mental strength.

"I am steadily gaining in physical strength and brain power. I formerly did mental work and had to give it up on account of coffee, but since using Postum I am doing hard mental labor with less fatigue than ever before."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in new, concentrated form called Instant Postum. It is regular Postum so processed at the factory that only the soluble portions are retained.

A spoonful of Instant Postum with hot water, and sugar and cream to taste, produce instantly a delicious beverage.

Write for the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

THE STATURE OF CHRIST*

FOR every task there is an ideal. The laborer upon a building has before him the sketch handed by the contractor; the contractor has the full plans drawn up by the architect; the architect had in his mind a vision, the ideal of the edifice to be built. Even in the more humdrum tasks, such as the making of a dress or the baking of a cake, there is always either the actual, tangible model, or else the ideal in the mind of the worker toward which he strives.

For many centuries, in the business of trying to be good, men had only this mental ideal of what a good man should really be, but this ideal was made more definite by the written words of various sets of moral laws. All over the world men had this fundamental sense of the difference between right and wrong and the deep feeling that they ought to do right. The different sets of laws by which they tried to attain their ideal of righteousness differed very widely. There was only one authentic set of laws, and that was the code prepared by Moses under the direction of the one true God. But in many of these nations, both those who had the correct written law to guide them and those who had only the incorrect codes upon which their wise men had labored, there was the hope, and, in many cases, the confident expectation that all these ideals and plans would some day be made real in the actual life of a Man.

Did you ever stop to think what a striking proof of the deity of Christ it is that since his time the thought of the leading races of the world has looked backward instead of forward for the ideal? The disciples asked him, in a time of temporary doubt, "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" But ever since his day the conviction has been growing with incredible swiftness and strength that he is the consummate pattern for the business of building character.

So the very practical question that confronts every one of us every day is simply: "How can I be like Jesus?"

In the first place we must study most carefully the Model. Just as the contractor must follow minutely the plans of the architect, so the Christian must study the life, the words, the teachings of Jesus, as disclosed in the pages of the New Testament.

Aside from the study of his character as we find it in the Bible, we have also the amazing privilege of becoming his personal friends and companions. It is impossible to over-emphasize this feature of the Christian life. It is in reality almost all there is to it—simply to be friends of Jesus. That is the way his church started—just as a little circle of men and women who loved him. It has grown by having these friends of his tell others about the delights and hopes his friendship brings. It is a universally recognized fact that close companions are apt to become like one another, so as we associate with Christ in intimate, friendly companionship, as we talk with him moment by moment at our work or play and in the special hours of prayer, we shall grow more and more like him.

But there is still another definite step in this matter of becoming like Jesus. We must recognize the mystical and magical power of his blood to cleanse our hearts and make them like his own. Many books have been written on this great subject of the redemption of the death of Christ to the hearts of men who trust in him, but it is not at all necessary to understand any theory or philosophy that has grown up about this great fact. We only know that people who accept the fact of the death of Christ as the thing that makes possible the forgiving of their sins and the cleansing of their hearts are made really sweet and pure and kind and good and holy. The very best and highest type of saints that any of us know are those who take for the watchword and model of their lives:

Never further than thy cross,
Never higher than thy feet.

A word must be said about the Holy Spirit. There is a very close connection between the help that we get from the Holy Spirit and the faith that we have in the power of the blood of Jesus. It is this death of Christ that makes possible the coming of the Holy Spirit to our lives. And it is the Holy Spirit dwelling in us that makes it possible for us to be like Jesus. The same Spirit who came to the disciples on the day of Pentecost will come into our hearts, if we will let him, filling us with holy fire and giving us the power that we lack to follow accurately our great Pattern.

But after all these things have been done there remains the daily and hourly task and privilege of becoming constantly and actually more and more like Jesus. As we learn new things about him, as he whispers new secrets to our hearts, as we contemplate more earnestly his sacrifice for us, as we rely more perfectly upon his Spirit dwelling within us, we find new ways of being like him, we come to think new and beautiful thoughts, we come to see new and unexpected ways by which we can serve others in his name, we find fresh avenues for expanding and applying the great principle of self-sacrificing love, which has become, by his grace, the dominant motive of our lives.

The Greater Work Ahead*

EVERY Epworth Leaguer ought to have in his private room a small globe, and he should think constantly as he looks upon it of the words of the great Wesley, the name of whose birthplace our league bears. "The world is my parish." That is to be or thought and our prayer, our hope, our anxiety, our passion, our effort, our determination: "The world for Christ."

The Epworth League has done splendid things in past years, yet we must not keep our eyes and minds on the achievements of the past but on the possibilities of the future. So long as there are any people in the world who have not heard of Christ, so long as there are sinful people anywhere, so long as there is oppression and injustice and hunger and want and sadness and pain anywhere, the Epworth League has work to do.

These words of Jesus, "The works that I do shall he do also, and greater works than these shall he do," are very staggering. Yet he seems to have meant them to be taken literally, for he prefaces them with the impressive formula: "Verily, verily, I say unto you." Yet in the light of the history of Christ's church the words become easy to grasp. Christ had all the power of God; yet he had for the conveying of that power to the people who needed help only two hands, two feet, one tongue. He promised that the same power that he himself had should remain in his church; and his church has millions of feet and tongues and hands. How vastly greater then ought its results to be than those that were possible to him when his mighty Spirit was imprisoned in the limits of one body!

But the question for each of us is: "Am I doing my part? Am I filling my place well in this new and greater body of Christ through which his power is to flow for the salvation and comfort and healing of men? Are my feet and hands and tongue doing their part?"

"Now, boy!"

"I know they think I'm feeble-minded. Folks sesso. Mebbe I be. But I ain't feeble-handed—"

"Oh, John, John!" cried Annie.

"I ain't no doubt I am. Most folks be. I got more wits than I useter hev. I mind w'en my intellect come to me one day, it come with a buz. But ef the seelec'men an' the overseers knowed you'd give me my freedom they'd clap me onto somebody else quicker'n scat. Folks better think you're a-farming of me out. I guess I'll fetch some more chips fust. There's quite a consider'ble down where they're buildin' the new kivered bridge. Mis' Palmer, marm, Mis' Graham, ye shan't never want fer nothin' w'ile I've got my two han's."

"What flow of eloquence is this I come upon?" cried a gay voice, and a burst of sunshine seemed to pour into the low dark room when the door blew to behind Clary.

The color mounted to the bound boy's ruddy hair, and his eyes wandered a trifle more than usual. "Ma! Mis' Perry has given me her new alapaca to make up!"

"That so?" said Mrs. Palmer. "Now ain't that a beginning!"

"Yes, she has. She has confidence. She see how my own gowns set. And I know jes' how it's a-goin' ter look. She's white an' slim. I sha'n't put a bit of gimp or beads on it, but have jes' long lines to set off her figger. She'll look like a lily on a stem." And Clary's eyes saw the picture of Mrs. Perry making a sunshine in a shady place, and her face shone with the glow of the artist.

She took off her shawl, catching up her great black cat. "Peter Paul," she said, burying her face in his fur, "Peter Paul, pleasant precious, perfect Puss Palmer, you shall have cream now every day of your life!"

"Pretty person," said John, either to the cat or to Clary, picking up his basket to get more chips before dark.

"If I could see you, John," said Annie.

"You'd see a fine-lookin' six-foot feller, Mis' Graham," he said with a wide wink for her mother, "with coal-black hair, an' black eyes 'ith a spark to 'em, and a moustache, and a mighty takin' way 'ith him!"

"Go 'long, John," said Mrs. Palmer.

"Oh, ain't it splendid, ma?" cried Clary, coming back. "It won't be any time at all before I can buy an alapaca for Gran' and a French calico for you with little sprigs of tiny garding flowers on a white ground—"

"I guess you'll be jest as well off as ef Erle Snow's son warn't too good fer ye!" said her grandmother.

Suddenly the girl's lip quivered, and she dropped her cat and ran out of the room. "Oh, isn't it wicked?" she said to herself, in her own room. "I don't see why old Mr. Snow's notions should stand between us and happiness," she murmured. "I'd have ben reel good to him. He'd have liked me, come to know me."

"You go up to her, Annie," said the grandmother.

"No," said Annie, "we have to meet our griefs alone."

And then Clary began to sing in order to mislead them downstairs, and presently she was enjoying her singing. She sang in the singing-seats on Sundays; and if now at first it was a little quaveringly, presently it was the full flood of melody, although she was not thinking at all of the beautiful old song, but of Mrs. Perry's gown, and then she tied on her apron and ran down, saying, "I'm goin' to make dip-toast for supper," and began stirring round in the pantry.

"Mother's sunshine!" said Annie.

Down in his office in behind the long counter, where he fingered his ledger without looking at it, Erle Snow would have been surprised if he had heard any one call him "old Mr. Snow." In spite of the facts of his experience and of the existence of a stalwart son, he looked on himself as young; he took it for granted rather, and thought nothing about it. If he had thought he would have said that life stopped for him one morning twenty years ago. Perhaps there had been few days when he had not remembered this tragedy of his youth, of his whole life. Yet no one dreamed of tragedy or romance, or of the wild stir of longings and regrets in this silent and prosperous man of small affairs, stern and of an inflexible honesty, a man who had been out in the world. He had not chosen his wife; she had chosen him; and he had not cared. Annie never came down to the village; since returning he had seen her only in the far distance like a glimmer of blue on the hill-top.

Just now his heart was more than a little sore for Steve's trouble—trouble he felt that must be met and endured. He would send the boy away. That, however, did him, himself, no good. But there was nothing else for it—unless—ah, that was too great a sacrifice! He drew in his breath sharply. But what of that? He must, he must tell Stephen the whole story! He was not going to have the boy's life ruined by the evil strain that ran in the veins of Clary Graham, cost what it might to speak. Yes—then he would send him off into a region of fresh interests. That is, as soon as he could find any one to take his place in the store.

It was at that fortunate moment that Mrs. Palmer's Bound Boy opened the door. "I've come to see ef you don't want some help to the store," said John, so eagerly that the words tumbled out half formed. "Mis' Palmer's giv me my time"—which he hadn't meant to say—"and I'm lookin' for work. I'm mighty good help."

The very thing! The bargain was soon struck. John was to come tomorrow morning early, if he was sure he was free. "Free as the wind," said John as he went out feeling like a man with a place in the world.

Mr. Snow would have preferred some one other than from the Palmers. But in his strait he could not be too nice; and John had a reputation of his own.

"I don't know if he will have wit enough to make change," said the man, returning to his son in the office.

"John's as bright as anybody," said Steve indignantly. "Only he's slow. They call him wanting because he sets lookin' into the sky an' sayin' nothin'—studyin' the weather. He can tell a storm comin' two hundred miles away. He can call the birds to light on his finger; and there ain't one o' them can do it!"

"Well, well," said Mr. Snow, wheeling his chair about, and tipping his fingers together, "I don't know that there's any particular advantage in calling the birds to sit on your finger. But that's neither here nor there. I'm going to tell you, Stephen," he went on after a moment huskily, "the reason I can't have you marryin' that Graham girl. It's hard—it's terrible"—and he paused a moment, catching his breath.

"Never mind, father," said Steve, choking up himself. "Never mind."

"I—I must mind," said the other. "It's twenty years ago. Here it is, here it is! We was missing small thin's here to the store, thin's of no 'count reely, such thin's as a customer helps himself to, mebbe, 'thout thinkin'. But one day father happened to leave a dollar bill on the counter, makin' change for her—for Annie. W'en she'd gone, that bill 'd gone, too! ''Twarn't possible!' I said, when father begun to talk. ''Twarn't possible!' But in a minute or two she come back with it, and she'd ketched it up 'ith her arrants. I felt as if a mountain had been lifted off my

An American Flag

And a Facsimile of the Declaration of Independence FREE

WOULDN'T you like to own an American Flag if you could get it for nothing? Not a little hand flag, understand, but a large size "Old Glory," 6 feet long by 4 feet wide, bigger than the top of your dining-room table. Not a pitiful wisp of color, mind you, but real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the Government flagmaker, and guaranteed not to fade, run or shrink, no matter what the weather.

And wouldn't you like to own a copy of the Declaration of Independence—a facsimile of that priceless document now in the old State House, Philadelphia?

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism. The Declaration should hang framed upon your wall and you will not only have use for a flag on every holiday for many years to come, but you can use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and, best of all, in the home. You will be able to celebrate Memorial Day properly with this flag!

Of Course You Want a Flag for Memorial Day

At this time of the year THE CHRISTIAN HERALD usually puts forth an extraordinary effort to increase the number of members of the great CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We can only do this with the help of the present members. You are one of these and we know you will help us. But we have no right to accept your good offices for nothing, and so we make you the following proposition:

How to Secure the Flag and Declaration Free

Isn't there some one among your relatives, friends or acquaintances who would be benefited by reading THE CHRISTIAN HERALD? You can probably think of several in a few minutes. We want them to join THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family. We want you to induce them to join, say, for a short trial period of Six Months. Induce at least one friend to take THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for six months, sending us 75 cents with the order, and for your trouble in procuring this New subscription we will send you the large American Flag and the facsimile reproduction of the Declaration of Independence entirely Free of all Charge.

Do not wait! Send in your order at once, so as to be sure to have the Flag reach you before Memorial Day.

heart. 'Thought better of it,' ses father. 'Old folks are unfeelin',' I ses to myself. Then, in a few days, father took a ten-dollar bill, and wrote his name acrost the back, though it made him liable any day for that ten dollars. And he left it on the show-case. Annie came in for some tea. Father'd judged they'd be about out o' tea by that time. She stayed talkin' a few minutes. And when she'd gone, and father looked for that bill, 'twarn't there, sir! It—warn't—there. That settled it. I went for her, and I charged her with it. It hurt me awful. And then I couldn't take a light-fingered woman for my wife. You couldn't have a—a thief for your mother. And she didn't deny it. I give her a night to think and to explain if she could. And I met her nex' mornin' and she broke off—"

"Father! Mis' Graham! You talkin' about Mis' Graham? I don't believe it!" cried Steve, all the fire of youth in his eye. "She couldn't do it! The sun'd have to fall from the sky fust. She's a saint on earth, a sufferin' saint! And if she did, 'twouldn't make a speck o' difference to me. I ain't a-marryin' her. I'd take Clary if she had forty mothers and every one o' them thieves!"

"Ain't it any use," cried his father, in a white rage, "that I've gone and stripped my heart bare to you? You ain't any son o' mine! When I was your age I took my father's will and word for the will and word o' God. I've done with you!"

Meanwhile John, having filled Mrs. Palmer's bin, had sold a barrow-load of the chips that he had gathered earlier in the afternoon, had come with his slow and gentle movement to spend his ten cents for some smoked herring for supper, feeling already the joys of a good provider. He sat down and waited; and while he waited he heard all that Mr. Snow said.

At first the accusation was so enormous, so atrocious, that he did not fully comprehend it. It was too impossible. Mis' Graham? She never done it! That the white sweet soul should suffer such cruelty! He was half stunned. Then a slow indignation began to burn to a white heat. Everything became a blind whirl in his brain. Only one thing remained fixed. She never did it, and it must be proved. He would have roared in his wrath, but that would hurt her. It wouldn't clear her, and she must be cleared. It would hinder his being allowed here; and here was where the bill was lost, and here it must be found! He had never thought so rapidly before in all his life. Yes, he understood now; that was what he came into this world for—to find that lost ten-dollar bill with old Stephen Snow's name across the back, to clear Mis' Graham. Perhaps only a feeble-minded person could have imagined such a possibility after twenty years and more. He left the store as noiselessly as he had entered it, and he forgot all about the smoked herring.

A Wide Field of Usefulness

IF WE were asked to name one great religious weekly which, according to our judgment, has done and is now doing more good in the world than any other journal, we would unhesitatingly name THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, published at the Bible House in New York City. While modestly evangelical it is non-sectarian, and has a large following among Christians of all names and nations. In times of famine and disaster, no other religious journal has done so much to alleviate human suffering. The price is only $1.50 a year. —Western Christian Union, Booneville, Mo.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. W. W., Crosswicks, N. J. Are there any passages in the Bible that say we shall know each other in heaven?

God has universally implanted in the human heart not only the desire for immortality, but for recognition in the future life of that which we hold as purest and dearest in the present. This desire is as old as the race itself and has found expression in the creeds and literature of every age. If we consider the teaching of the Bible on this subject, it is impossible to escape the conclusion that we shall know each other in the future life. See David's lament over his little son: "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (II Sam. 12: 23). See what Paul says about "ministering spirits" and "unseen witnesses," all implying recognition (Heb. 1: 12-14). See also II Cor. 4: 14; Eph. 2: 6; I Thess. 4: 13-18; Col. 3: 4; Rom. 12: 5. But Jesus, who "brought life and immortality to light" in a new and vivid sense, has given us also the assurance of recognition beyond the grave. In the parable of Dives and Lazarus it is clearly set forth, and in speaking to his disciples (John 14: 3, 4) individual recognition is implied, otherwise the language would be pointless.

G. D. W., Denver, Col. Please tell me what other name had the disciple Nathanael.

The general belief is that Bartholomew and Nathanael are the same person. This is based on the fact that John's Gospel mentions Nathanael twice and never refers to Bartholomew, while Matthew, Mark and Luke tell of Bartholomew, but make no reference to Nathanael.

Sorrowful. While your problem is undeniably an exceedingly painful one, you must believe that there is a plain way out of it. It is, however, one which cannot be judged at a distance, especially as it involves personal complications that can only be dealt with as they arise—although they may never arise at all. We think you would do well to consult your own pastor, or any minister of ripe experience in dealing with the individual cases of a parish. Such a one, being near at hand and familiar with the varied troubles that overshadow human lives and destroy happiness, would be the best adviser. You must believe, too, that Christ is infinitely tender as well as infinitely just and that he will not ask you to do anything without giving you strength to do it. It is not always necessary to confess to others or to make a public confession. Often the harm and distress which would come to them would more than offset the good that might result. This may be the fact in your case. Yet, if the offended one be a true Christian, he will show the spirit of forgiveness and cover all faults with generous love and confidence.

J. McG., Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. There is nowhere the promise, during the "fulness of the Gentiles," of any special opportunity for the salvation of sinners, although some writers have inferred it from various passages. Professor Weiss notes the close of Romans, 11th chapter, with the doxology on the "unsearchable riches" of the divine grace, which in God's wisdom and knowledge could give redemption alike to both Jew and Gentile by ways and means we know not of. (See Isa. 40: 13; Job 41: 2.) It should be observed that Rom. 11th chapter, deals with Israel as a people, and the Gentiles as a people, and not with individuals. 2. See I Cor. 15th chapter and Rom. 8: 11. Much has been written concerning the resurrection, but these passages give real light on the subject which makes the varying conjectures of commentators of little worth.

E. P. M., Monroe, Mich. 1. There are several colleges in which such Bible teaching as is given in divinity courses is tinged with liberalism or "higher criticism," with the result that students receive a very doubtful kind of preparation for service in the pulpit. 2. Dancing, while it may not in itself be an evil, is to be avoided because it leads to promiscuous and dangerous acquaintanceships. Many of the modern dances are objectionable because of being vulgar and immodest. 3. The tree of life conferred immortality; the tree of knowledge gave the power to discern between good and evil.

B. L. C., Providence, R. I. Has a Christian a right to believe: (1) That Christ plans all the little things that come into our lives—those we call happenings? (2) That Christ shows approval of his servant's work by giving him good weather to go about in, strength for the work and great joy in doing it?

As a basic thought in considering these questions it should be remembered that the attitude Christ wishes to assume toward all his followers is that of a friend. He said to his disciples: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends." We "work together" with him as friend with friend; our interests are identical with his and his with ours. On this basis it is perfectly rational to believe that he will give us all the help we need in the work we are trying to do for him. (1) Christ certainly knows all about all the "little things" that come into our lives; also he will allow nothing to happen which will spoil or seriously hinder our work. Paul believed that Satan was trying to hamper him; in one place he says definitely that Satan hindered him, really prevented him from getting where he wanted to go (1 Thess. 2: 18). The right attitude is to ask God to further our tasks and then heroically and patiently keep at them. We must remember, too, that a certain amount of hardship and suffering is really necessary to develop the most stalwart Christian character. (See Heb. 12: 1-11; II Tim. 2: 3; Heb. 11, etc.) (2) The Christian must beware of praying selfishly. A brave soldier would hardly pray for fair weather, except as it would aid the battle. We may certainly pray for strength; and the joy will come as we forget self in loving and serving the Master.

Mrs. M. D., Ossian, Ind. 1. There is not a Catholic member in the present cabinet. 2. Nineveh was destroyed about 630-635 B.C. Diodorus Siculus gives the account of its destruction as related by Ctesias. The armies of Cyaxares the Median and Nabopolassar the Babylonian monarchs laid siege to the city for two years and a flood in the Tigris made a great breach in the walls, giving entrance to the besieging armies. The whole city was burned and its great buildings leveled. Saracus, the Assyrian king, burned himself in his palace.

N. W., Providence, R. I. Kindly explain Matt. 27: 5-8 and Acts 1: 18-20. How could Judas meet with two different deaths?

It is likely that Judas arranged for the purchase of the field and that the priests, after he had returned the money to them, completed the transaction by the payment of the purchase price. In relating the event Matthew says that the priests purchased the field; the account in Acts states that Judas purchased it. As to the manner of Judas's death the two accounts are not contradictory. It is believed that Judas hanged himself from a tree at the crest of the precipice above this field and, the rope breaking, fell to the ground below. Two explanations of the name of the field are given. It is natural to believe that both these reasons contributed to the dreadful name. It was a "field of blood" both because it was purchased with the price of the Saviour's life and because of the horrible death there of the traitor himself.

C. M. V., Clear Lake, Ia. The marriage laws setting forth the degrees of relationship where union is forbidden may be found in Leviticus, 18th chapter. In 1563, the Church of England set forth in a table of "kindred and affinity," the forbidden degrees. Intermarriage between cousins is not specifically mentioned, but such unions are generally discouraged for physiological reasons.

Alfred S., Washington, D. C., sends us a copy of a poem entitled "Twenty Years Ago," the opening verse of which reads:

"I've wandered to the village, Tom, I've sat
beneath the tree,
Upon the schoolhouse playing-ground, which sheltered you and me:
But none were there to greet me, Tom, and few were left to know,
That played with us upon the grass some twenty years ago."

Will any reader who knows the author's name kindly send it to THE MAIL-BAG?

Are These Things There?

By R. E. Olds, Designer

In buying a car in 1913 here are some things to look for. By them judge how the car is built, how up-to-date it is.

And judge by them if the maker gives you the very best he knows.

Outer Features

Note if the car has left side drive, like the leading cars today. Does the driver sit close to the cars he passes, or on the farther side?

Has the car electric set-in dash lights, or the old projecting lamps?

Is it under-tired or over-tired? That makes enormous difference in your tire upkeep.

Is one front door blocked up by levers? Or do levers block the passage between the two front seats? If so, the driver half the time must enter from the street.

Is the upholstering genuine leather? Is the filling the best curled hair? Does the finish show the final touch in every part and detail?

Inner Features

How many Timken bearings has the car? They cost five times what common ball bearings cost.

In Reo the Fifth there are 15 roller bearings, 11 of which are Timkens.

In Reo the Fifth there are 190 drop forgings, used to avoid the risk of flaws.

The steel is made to formula. It is analyzed twice to prove its correctness.

The gears are tested in a 50-ton crushing machine. The springs are tested for 100,000 vibrations.

We use a $75 magneto, a doubly-heated carburetor, a smokeless oiling system, big, strong brakes.

We give to each driving part vast margin of safety—50 per cent over capacity.

Each engine gets five long tests. And each, after testing, is taken apart and inspected.

If you seek a durable car, a trouble-proof car, and low cost of upkeep, these are points to consider.

Skimping Is Now Unpopular

Many a car has gone into obscurity because the maker skimped.

I go to the other extreme in these days—after 26 years of car building I spend about $200 per car for features unusual in this type of car.

Men who buy my cars expect it. They expect low cost of upkeep, freedom from trouble. They expect a five-year-old car to run as well as new.

I have built such cars for legions of men. And every Reo the Fifth which goes out this year marks my level best. In the years to come, you men who get them will realize why I do this.

It means slow, careful building. It means endless inspection. It means grinding parts over and over. It means doing in a $1,095 car what users expect, and what makers must give, in a $4,000 car.

Where I Save

Such a car at such a price is made possible in this way:

We have a model factory, so finely equipped that engineers from everywhere come here to inspect it. Here we build the entire car by the most efficient methods.

Then this entire factory is devoted to a single model. Every machine, tool and mechanic is adapted to its production. We save in this way about 20 per cent under what it would cost to build two or three models.

Thus we give you a car, built as we describe, at this matchless price.

The Demand

Our output is limited to 50 cars daily, so cars are never rushed. Last April and May the demand for our cars ran five times our factory output.

We have worked all winter, at fullest capacity, to avoid that condition this spring. But a shortage is inevitable. If you want spring delivery on Reo the Fifth, please see your dealer now.

Our Unique Control

In Reo the Fifth you find a one-rod control. And that rod is out of the way—between the two front seats.

All the gear shifting is done by moving this rod only three inches in each of four directions. It is as simple as moving the spark lever.

Both brakes are operated by foot pedals. So there are no levers, side or center. The driver's way is clear.

No other 1913 car has this form of center control. And a car without it will seem inconvenient when you see what this form means.

This control rod comes at the driver's right hand, for the car has left-side drive.

A thousand dealers handle Reo the Fifth. Write for our catalog and we will direct you to our nearest showroom.

Questions and Answers

H. W. L., Ohio. What is the meaning of the words: "What advantageth it me if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." 1 Cor. 15: 32.

Scholars differ as to the correct punctuation of this verse. The Revised Versions change the form to read: "If the dead are not raised, let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die." In either case Paul is quoting a proverb of the times, and either states or implies, in his enthusiasm for the doctrine of the resurrection, that if there is to be no life after this we might as well adopt the Epicurean philosophy and give ourselves to pleasure in this life. It is hardly likely that if Paul had been held down to a real expression of his own views he would yield even this much, for he had learned that a life of self-sacrifice is the life of greatest satisfaction. But he is so sure of the fact of immortality in Christ that he defiantly exclaims that if this hope is false we may as well get what pleasure we can to-day, knowing that death will come speedily.

E. N. B., Cœur d'Alene, Idaho. 1. We have no recent information of the evangelists you mention. 2. The passage in John 12: 32 prefigured his death on the cross. As the brazen serpent in the wilderness, being lifted up, drew the attention of the suffering multitude, who were healed as they gazed, now, in a universal sense, the uplifted Redeemer would give "life for a look" to all who believed on him and followed in his footsteps. No other words could express the attractive power of the Gospel as strongly as this verse.

A. C. L., Carlsbad, N. M. In Luke 22: 7-38, we have the account of the last Passover, the institution of the Supper and the last discourse at the table. Peter had protested against any possible lack of fidelity on his part and the Master had warned him of his weakness and had also warned his associates of the trials and persecutions they must undergo (see verses 35, 36). They would not be going forth on a temporary mission as heretofore, for which they needed neither purse nor scrip, but into scenes of severe trial where all provision for support and protection would be needed. Were they thus prepared? Had they provision, defense, everything that might be necessary for such an experience? They might even be so hard pressed that they would be as men driven to sell even their clothes to procure weapons of defense. Had they swords? That he was not advising but merely interrogating to show them the reality of the perils they must face is evident from the fact that when they produced two of the short swords worn by many of the Galilean peasants, he put them aside with: "It is enough." Peter the impulsive was one of the two sword-bearers, and when a little later, at the betrayal, he smote off the ear of Malchus, the high priest's servant, his impetuosity was checked by the Master, who even healed the wounded enemy. His language quoted in Matt. 26: 52 clearly shows that while he foreknew that violence must come, he would rather have his followers non-resistants than combatants.

T. R. D., Utica, Mo. Isa. 4: 1 opens by referring to the period of national calamity impending for Israel which was described in the preceding chapter. So many able-bodied men would be killed that the women would greatly outnumber the survivors. "Seven" is the symbol of completeness, implying that the preponderance would be complete or altogether disproportionate. It is here employed as a figure of speech to be the more impressive. It was considered a reproach for a Jewish woman to be unmarried.

I. B., Kinston, N. C. 1. Eccles. 12: 7 is interpreted to mean that the mortal frame returns to the dust, while the spirit survives, implying its immortality, its ultimate condition being in God's hands. 2. Ps. 24: 1 is a recognition of God's supreme sovereignty, which requires holiness of life and cleanness of heart in his children. In the following verses, it is made clear that only those who are righteous can hope for divine approval and blessing. There is not the slightest basis here for any claim that all will be approved alike, whether good or bad, but precisely the reverse. See verses 3-5.

L. A. J., Hopkinsville, Ky., and Mrs. C. M., Three Forks, Mont. What is the rest referred to in Heb. 4: 1-11? How and when does one enter it?

It is plain from the wording of this passage that the rest spoken of is an experience to be reached in this life, and entered simply by faith. In verse 3 the writer says definitely: "We who have believed do enter into rest." In verse 10 he says: "He that is entered into his rest, he also hath ceased from his own works as God did from his." The exhortations also in verses 1 and 11 imply that the rest is to be entered immediately, not at death. The whole tenor of the passage is that of the description of a state immediately attainable. Jesus promised to give rest to all who would come to him. (Matt. 11: 28.) This experience into which Christ leads the believer was even promised in the Old Testament. See Isa. 11: 10; 14: 3; Ps. 116: 7. It is implied in all the Bible teaching about deliverance from sin and fear. It is the rest of faith.

Reader, Pennsylvania. In Pennsylvania, if a man dies intestate, leaving a widow and children, the widow receives one-third of the real estate for life and one-third of the personal property absolutely. If a woman dies, leaving a husband and children, the husband receives the use of the realty for life and all of the personalty absolutely. If the wife makes a will leaving her property to her children, her husband will be cut off from everything except his life use of the real property, from which she cannot deprive him.

Reader, Uvalda, Ga. The case you describe is one of peculiar hardship, since compliance with human law gives no assurance of pardon or peace of mind where the divine law has been transgressed. Then there may be a possibility that after so many years, to attempt rectification would result in making victims of innocent persons, who were quite irresponsible for the original trouble. We would advise a frank consultation with your own pastor, who will doubtless be glad to help you in any way possible.

O. D. D., Stambaugh, Mich. There is a wide distinction between paternal love or affection and conjugal love. There is no other kind of human love that is as perfect as that of a mother for her offspring or a father for his children. It is a type of God's own love towards us, which is the only perfect love.

J. H., Wyoming. If the decree of divorce forbids the remarriage of the wife, she cannot marry again in the State of New York, and so far as New York State is concerned, any marriage she may contract there would be void. She can, however, marry in another State and the marriage will be good in that State. Generally, where the decree forbids the marriage of the offending party, it will be modified subsequently to allow him or her to remarry, if the other party has remarried, and if the conduct of the offending party has been reasonably good.

R. L. H., Gallipolis, Ohio. There is no passage of Scripture which gives any ground for the belief in a second probation, although attempts have been made to distort certain passages into such a meaning. The passage you quote (1 Cor. 15: 29, 30) is one of this sort. It has reference to some symbolical rite of baptism or dedication of themselves (in the early church) "to follow the martyred saints even to death." It does not mean that the dead themselves are baptized.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. W. W., Crosswicks, N. J. No passage of the kind in the Bible.

D. R., Vestal, N. Y. The passage you have in mind is probably 1 Kings 19: 19.

Mrs. J. D. There is no passage in the Bible closely resembling the quotation you mention. Matt. 7: 20 is somewhat like it.

R. R., Allentown, Pa. Write to the clerk of the Senate, Washington, D. C., enclosing postage, for a copy of the document, giving number and date.

T. E. C., Leander, Texas. We cannot set limits to God's mercy. Even such as you describe may find pardon, if they repent of their sins and turn to the source of forgiveness.

If "Perplexed Reader," of Bridgeport, Conn., and the reader from Bancroft, Mich., who sent lists of questions some months ago will furnish us with their addresses their letters will be answered personally by mail.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. Matt. 25: 31-46 describes the Last Judgment in language unequaled in grandeur and simplicity. It is a topic all too rarely discussed in the pulpit to-day.

W. S. H., Virginia, Ill. 1. The best training for a young man in journalism is to get employment on some newspaper, city or country, and "begin at the beginning." Write to Professor Talcott Williams, director, School of Journalism, New York City, about practical studies. 2. The signs you send are those of the Pitman system, which is in general use.

THIS AMERICAN FLAG And a Facsimile of the Declaration of Independence FREE

WOULDN'T you like to own a large American Flag, like the one shown in this picture, if you could get it for nothing? Not a little hand flag, understand, but a man-size "Old Glory," 6 feet long by 4 feet wide, bigger than the top of your dining-room table.

Not a pitiful wisp of color, mind you, but real red, white and blue, right from the factory of the Government flagmaker, and guaranteed not to fade, run or shrink, no matter what the weather.

And wouldn't you like to own a copy of the Declaration of Independence—a facsimile of that priceless document now in the old State House, Philadelphia?

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism. The Declaration should hang framed upon your wall and you will not only have use for a flag on every holiday for many years to come, but you can also use it constantly for decorative purposes in public and private sociables, in the schoolhouse, in the church, and, best of all, in the Home. You will be able to celebrate Memorial Day properly with this flag!

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

VISITING THE SCENE OF THE FLOODS

BY E. R. JOHNSTONE

EXCEPT to the people who suffered, the story of the floods that devastated such large portions of Ohio and West Virginia this spring is as a thrice-told tale. To them, however, the disaster is an ever-present and continuing tragedy. One is tempted, in speaking of the results of the floods, to use the old newspaper phrase, "They beggar description." I shall not attempt an estimate as to the losses, because no proper computation can possibly be made at this writing. It is true that the loss of life was mercifully much smaller than early reports indicated. It is also true that thousands of escapes, especially in the more populous centers, bordered on the miraculous. Estimates as to losses of property cannot be anywhere near accurate, by reason of the fact that it is impossible to figure on the amount of salvage from stores and factories that were under water for days. On the other hand, it is completely impossible to tell the amount of damage inflicted upon former fertile farms and gardens now covered in many places with sand and gravel to such a depth that their removal and the restoration of the soil must be a labor of years.

A TYPICAL SCENE AMONG THE WRECKAGE AND DEBRIS SCATTERED ABOUT THE CITY OF MARIETTA, OHIO, BY THE WATERS OF THE MUSKINGUM AND OHIO RIVERS

When the Western Flood Fund of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD reached an aggregate that made its disposition worth while, it was decided that the fund could be appropriated with greatest certainty of good along the valley of the Ohio between Marietta, Ohio, and Huntington, W. Va. This region, about one hundred and fifty miles long and from two to five miles in width, suffered terribly, the destruction by the Ohio itself being augmented by that from the flood waters of the Muskingum and the Great and Little Kanawha Rivers, its tributaries.

It has been my privilege in other years to act as almoner for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers in scenes and countries far distant, but I can say unqualifiedly that never has more heartfelt gratitude been offered than from those who have been or will be recipients of assistance.

In the fortnight since I left New York, I have traversed about six hundred miles by rail, motor boat, automobile, wagon and horseback. It may readily be understood that all ordinary means of transportation were either wholly destroyed or mutilated into incapacity by the rushing waters. However, transportation and means of communication are absolutely necessary in times of disaster, and every effort was bent to rehabilitate the railroads and the roads. In the early stages of the flood, boats were used wherever they were available and were of great service.

Everywhere in my journeying I saw the same evidences of ruthless destruction—destruction to the point of destitution. Here one would see a massive bridge twisted out of all semblance and deposited in a field a mile away from the stream that it had crossed. Lodged against it, perhaps, would be a handsome residence, torn from its foundations many miles up the stream. Touching evidences of the home would strew and litter the banks and fields for miles—here a cradle, there a bedstead, farther on a bureau, a chair or a litter of books. Some undistinguishable mass might prove to be the muddied remains of what had once been handsome clothing.

The work of the line-restorer for telegraph or telephone communication was everywhere noticeable, and along the banks of the Ohio, between the villages of Mason City and Hartford, I chanced to note two telegraph wires strung, here upon a cradle, there upon a gate, at a proper interval upon a piano and still farther along upon a boat, all these fastenings being lodged well up on the trees that fringed the shores. The streets that, before the flood, were as orderly and as well cared for as those in any other towns, were obstructed by houses, churches, outbuildings, factories and a litter of fences, wires and pipes that made such thoroughfares impassable. Many of the homes had been completely gutted, not only of their usable contents, but of sashes, partitions, hearths and doors. A large majority of the homes had been moved only a comparatively short distance from their foundations, but many of the frame buildings, churches included, had been turned completely over and rested on their roof peaks, ghastly memories of the freakishness of the uncontrolled waters. In many places houses that had withstood the flood, so far as being moved was concerned, were still uninhabitable by reason of a deposit of from one to three feet of viscous, corroding mud.

There was an awful sameness in all the twenty-two villages and hamlets visited, but my sympathies were especially excited for those who dwelt along the banks of the rivers in isolated farmhouses. They had not the protection of adjoining walls or of the buttresses that other buildings give, and where they were not utterly destroyed the houses were rendered completely uninhabitable, while in many cases the farms themselves, if not disappearing into the maw of the river, were so overladen with sand and gravel as to be useless for agricultural purposes.

It may be well here to answer a question that has been asked all over this country: "What about insurance?" There was no insurance against this destruction. "Providential" is the word applied in all policies, whether for household effects, stocks in stores or materials in factories. This, in all cases, releases the companies from damage. Even the plate glass companies declined to pay the losses caused by the flood, and doubtless are legally justified in so declining.

MR. E. R. JOHNSTONE

The Christian Herald's Special Commissioner for the Ohio Valley Flood

I found the people wonderfully hopeful, wonderfully alert, wonderfully active. Far more wonderful, however, than these qualities were those of universal sympathy and neighborliness exhibited. There were no men or women too rich or too poor, too prosperous or too much affected by personal loss to give hearty aid to those in worse condition than themselves. It made one proud of his race and kind. It gave a new meaning to the grasp of the human hand and to the look from human eyes.

Through the country which I traversed, considerable relief work had been done before I arrived by the Federal, State, county and municipal authorities, and by national agencies, but in this particular territory the proportion of help had not been as great as in Dayton, Columbus, and other Ohio towns farther north. It may readily be believed that the offer I bore from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Flood Fund was hailed with delight. It was impossible to give sums of money to isolated cases—impossible because I could not decide as to worthiness, not knowing the people or the local conditions, nor was it feasible for farmers and residents in small hamlets to draw money from New York, especially under the conditions still existing. I deemed it best therefore to constitute, in different centers, committees which should cover not only their own, but contiguous territory, for a radius of from twenty to fifty miles. Acting upon this, committees were constituted in the cities of Marietta, Ohio, Parkersburg, Point Pleasant and Huntington, W. Va., and later in Zanesville, Ohio. These committees would cover not only the cities named, but such towns and villages as Beverly, Lowell, and Unionville

THE STORM CENTER OF EUROP

THE prophecy of Premier Asquith of Great Britain that an honorable and peaceable settlement would be reached "rather sooner than later" in the Montenegro-Austria-Albania tangle is so far unfulfilled. The international fleet has lain idly threatening off Montenegro's little twenty-eight miles of seacoast, while the ambassadors of the Great Powers of Europe have urged King Nicholas to reconsider his decision and evacuate the disputed city of Scutari. All are agreed that this must be done, though all except Austria-Hungary urge the delay of forcible measures until every other possible means has been tried. From Vienna daily announcements have come that Austria would wait no longer. Nicholas must move or war would be declared the next day. Yet up to May 2 nothing more serious than the movement toward the border of larger bodies of troops had taken place. Prince Danilo of Montenegro has moved part of his army from Scutari toward the Austrian frontier and has posted heavy artillery in the passes that give entrance to the little land of "the Black Mountain."

The stage is set for a momentous struggle. Austria ranks among the first six nations of the world in military strength, yet Montenegro, small and vainglorious though she may be, has the advantage of her mountains, which have never yet been conquered.

Montenegro is temporizing at the brink of the precipice, for should the struggle come she must, in the end, be vanquished unless the other Slav peoples of Servia, Bulgaria, Hungary and Russia rise to save her. This is perhaps King Nicholas's dream of Pan-Slavism, and if it comes true then there will be such changes in Europe's map as only Napoleon made.

The decision that Europe is urging Montenegro to accept was outlined as follows by Sir Edward Grey in the British House of Commons on April 7: "This agreement is that there should be an autonomous Albania. We willingly became a party to this, for the Albanians are separate in race, in language, and to a great extent in religion. The war which is proceeding against them has long ceased to have any bearing on the war between Turkey and the allies or to be a war of liberation. The operations of Montenegro against Scutari are part of a war of conquest, and there is no reason why the same sympathy that was felt for Montenegro or other countries contending for liberty should not be extended to the Albanian population of Scutari and its district, who are mainly Catholic and Moslem, and who are contending for their lands, their religion, their language, and their lives. For these reasons his Majesty's government have no hesitation in being parties to the agreement of the Powers about Albania. The agreement between the Powers respecting the frontiers of Albania was realized after a long and laborious diplomatic effort. It was decided that the littoral and Scutari should be Albanian, while Ipek, Prizrend, Dibra, ar after much negotiation—Djakova should be cluded from Albania. This arrangement leav large tract of territory to be divided between Se and Montenegro as the fruits of victory. The n ing of the agreement was essential for the peac Europe." Referring to the territory to be div between Servia and Montenegro an English wr says: "True; but if Montenegro is not to have fertile country about Scutari she will gain l but worthless additions to the 'heap of stones wl God dropped upon her when he made the wo This is the crux of the position. The small pop tion of Montenegro is stationary; it cannot sub on its barren soil; the Montenegrins n elbow room."

VISITING THE SCENE OF THE FLOODS

in the Muskingum Valley; Bellepre, Belleville, Hartford, Mason City, Guyandotte, Cereco and Kenova, W. Va.

Believing also that Governor H. D. Hatfield of West Virginia would be a good adviser and could use as large an amount of money as was possible to spare him in helping isolated cases that would later come to his knowledge, I left with him a fund which he will distribute with the aid of his personal staff.

In every place the committees were made up of the very best possible material, and I mean that in its broadest sense. Upon all, or nearly all, of them a clergyman was named. In four cases the mayors are chairmen, and in every case the remaining members of the committees are men of the very highest standing and with the widest information as to the needs of the communities in which they dwell.

It is not deemed wise at this time to give the names of the committeemen and the amounts of money entrusted to their care, and the reason for this will be readily understood. They are men of affairs, terribly burdened at this time with losses of their own, and were connected with the distribution of relief from other sources, especially that furnished by the Federal Government. To publish their names or the amounts at their disposal would be to add to their burdens and make them subject to requests from many sources that, upon requisition, might prove unworthy. The names and the amounts allotted are in the possession of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and the committees will make due account of their stewardships.

Whom will THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund help? Those most worthily in need and those who without this help might be reduced to despair. The superficial wants of the sufferers have been cared for, splendidly cared for. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD committees will reach the cases of those to whom extra help will mean more than even the most vivid imagination can properly paint. There are, unfortunately, thousands of such cases. Worthy men and women have seen the accumulation of a lifetime of toil disappear, leaving them stranded upon the shores of absolute want. There are hundreds of people along the Ohio whose homes have been washed from their foundations and overturned and who have not the money to replace them.

As an example. One of the reasons for allotting to Governor Hatfield a sum of money for distribution was a telephonic announcement from the sheriff in Mason City that six families had that day been found outside of the town, absolutely destitute, without food or clothing and in such hopeless case that unless money was speedily forthcoming they must become a public charge. The destitution of these decent, worthy people was not discovered until nearly three weeks had elapsed from the time of high water. And what they must have undergone in those three weeks it makes one shudder to think.

I could fill pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with individual instances of suffering, of heroic rescues and splendid sacrifices. In order to show more specifically what the fund will do, let me mention two instances and let them suffice as an index to cases that the committees will seek to relieve.

On one of the streets of Marietta, when the mayor and the postmaster of that city were showing me some of the greatest evidences of destruction, we saw an overturned house to which the mayor directed my attention. "That is a sad case," said he. "That house belonged to a widow over sixty years old. After many years of hard work she had succeeded in building up a dressmaking business which promised not only to support her in comfort but to enable her to earn money to keep her when too old to work. Two or three days before the flood she received two sewing machines for which she paid $150, and installed them in her establishment. You see the house? That is all she has left. Everything else in the world is gone and she has not any money except what we can give her, even to replace the house upon its foundation or to buy the commonest necessaries of living. With what we can do from other sources and with some assistance from your fund we can give her a living start, and I tell you she deserves it if any one does

On an island in the Ohio lived an estimab couple who, in forty years of self-denial, had ma for themselves a pleasant home, had accumulat some stock and poultry, and from their viewpoi had reached the goal of a life of endeavor and we well to do. The rains descended and the floods can and washed away not only the house but all th stock; in short, everything that belonged to the Their own lives were saved with great difficulty a when I saw them, although it was weeks after th event, the man was absolutely dazed and the wom was practically bereft of reason. The money su scribed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD fund will b drawn upon to put renewed hope in the bosoms this aged couple and they will be made to feel th in times of suffering all the world is kin.

To show something of the generosity that sprin spontaneously in times of tragedy, a gentlewoma of moderate means was visiting friends in th Muskingum Valley at the time of the flood. As soo as it was possible after the waters had receded, th great heart clothed and fed seventy-two famili and kept this up for two weeks.

The suffering among the churches, as such, h been terrible. The flood was no respecter of ed fices. The report from Dr. Norcross, presidin elder of the Zanesville district, in whose jurisdi tion there are one hundred churches of the Meth dist Episcopal faith, reports that of 1,490 famili represented, 510 lost their homes and are in abs lute need of assistance. Dr. Norcross places th loss sustained by the people of these churches, ex clusive of the loss of the churches themselves, a $222,450. I give this instance as it is the only car ful estimate that I have been able to discover as ye Generous as THE CHRISTIAN HERALD subscriber have been, ten times the amount now in hand coul be used without the waste of one penny. Be we assured, however, that THE CHRISTIAN HERAL Flood Fund is now and will be for many years a name of sweet savor in the memories of the res dents of the Ohio and Muskingum Valleys fro Zanesville to Huntington.

ISLAM'S SPREAD IN AFRICA

BY W. W. HOOVER

THE spread of Islam in Africa is one of the most striking phenomena of the nineteenth century, Dr. Zwemer. Mohammedanism entered North Africa in 50 A.D., and spread along the Mediterranean coast to Morocco, thence southward to the Sudan. By the end of the thirteenth century the Hausa and other great pagan tribes of the Sudan had been completely Islamized, but it was not until 1[illegible] when Othman, a Fula of Sokoto, began his jehad, that Islam became a real aggressive force in the western Sudan. From that day to this Mohammedanism has been waging an active and successful propaganda among the pagan tribes. To-day Mohammedanism is the prevailing religion of all Africa north of the tenth parallel of north latitude, and is sweeping onward with ever increasing volume and momentum.

THE MISSION CHAPEL AT DONGA

In order to determine to what extent Islam is advancing in the Sudan, Dr. Karl W. Kumm in 1909 made a trans-African tour from the Niger to the Nile, following as nearly as possible along the southern limit of prevailing Mohammedanism. Dr. Kumm reports: "That Mohammedanism is spreading there cannot be the slightest doubt, and that it is spreading as the result of the conquest of the regions in question by Europeans is evident to any student of the geographical conditions or the political economy of Central Africa. The border war of five centuries between paganism and the Crescent faith in the mountain regions of Adamawa, in the Kordofan Hills, and in the Shari Valley has come to an end. Mohammedan traders and religious emissaries without having any definite Mohammedan missionary organization behind them are penetrating into the southern parts of the Sudan, and are extending their influence to West Africa, East Africa, and South Africa, and this may end in the whole of Africa becoming a Mohammedan continent, with only South Africa, parts of British East Africa, Uganda, and Abyssinia nominally Christian. Roughly speaking the tribes to the north of ten degrees north are Mohammedan." The remarkable Moslem advance in Central Africa is the work of the following four agents: 1. The Mecca pilgrim. 2. The trader. 3. The soldier. 4. The malam, or teacher. Some ten thousand Moslem pilgrims pass annually from West Africa to the East. All pilgrims are superlatively religious. They live Islam, and for them death on the way to Mecca or near the Kaaba is to be welcomed rather than otherwise, as heaven will unquestionably be theirs. The contact of the pilgrims with the pagans in the newly opened Central Sudan regions cannot therefore but advance the Crescent faith among the aborigines who have held to their animistic religions in barbaric simplicity. The Central African, being mentally a child, soon forgets the wrongs he has suffered at the hands of the Moslem slave raiders, and the war waged for almost half a millennium against his hereditary enemies, the Moslem Arabs, and Fulani is being obliterated from his memory. His persecutors cordially hated by him in former days are becoming his friends. The naked savage admires the clothed and educated Moslem devotee who condescends to sojourn with him. The second factor that helps the Moslem advance is found in the increased facilities for trade following in the wake of the "Pax Britannica." Only a few years ago many of the pagan tribes would not permit Mohammedan traders within their borders. Now in all British as well as in the French and German territories nearly every pagan village has its colony of Arab, Hausa, or Fula Moslem traders, and every Moslem trader is a missionary. Every new railroad, and new steamer, every new highway built by European enterprise in Central Africa helps the advance of the Mohammedan religion. The third agent at work in the propaganda of the faith of Mohammed is the soldier. England's Sudanese soldiers are practically all Mohammedans. New recruits are drawn from the pagan tribes, but as soon as they enlist they are made Moslems. Should they marry, as most of them do, their children are educated by the Moslem priests, and when they return to their native villages after their time of service, they return as diligent Moslem propagandists. The fourth representation of the Crescent faith who is doing yeoman service for his religion is the malam, teacher, priest and village scribe. The Moslem malam who can read and write and who also knows certain pagan languages is naturally the interpreter of the white governor's instructions and in many cases Moslem malams have been sent to pagan chiefs to act for them as scribes, as their mouthpieces in dealing with the government.

A YOUNG MOHAMMEDAN HAUSA

Unless the Christian Church bestirs herself, and that quickly, the entire continent of Africa is in danger of becoming Mohammedan. There is abundant testimony that Islam is spreading very rapidly, but unfortunately the Christian Church does not appear to have taken this very seriously. Sir Alfred Sharpe, governor of Nyassaland, says: "Twenty years ago, when I first knew Nyassaland, Mohammedanism was almost non-existent; since then it has spread greatly, particularly during the last eight or ten years. All through Taoland there is a mosque and Moslem teacher in almost every village." Bishop Gwynne of Khartum states that the advance of Mohammedanism in the Anglo-Egyptian Sudan is so rapid that Christian missions will either have to occupy the land within the next ten years or the tribes will have become Mohammedan. Pastor Wurz, secretary of the Basel Mission, says: "Islam is spreading with the certainty and irresistibleness of a rising tide."

In 1904 some of the leading men in the various denominations of Great Britain came together in London to consider what could be done to counteract the Mohammedan advance in Central Africa, and prevent the pagan tribes of the Sudan being carried into the faith of the false prophet. Various evangelical foreign missionary societies were approached and asked whether they would be able to occupy the Sudan, but without exception they expressed their inability. Claims in other parts of the world as well as lack of funds prevented their meeting the grave situation, though they all clearly stated their hope that something might be done and that a united missionary effort might be placed on foot in which all those churches, who were doing nothing for the Sudan, could co-operate. A resolution, signed by the secretaries of the principal missionary societies of Great Britain, declared that "In view of the present crisis in the West Central Sudan, where unless the Gospel of Christ be brought within the next few years to Northern Nigeria the million numbered pagan peoples of that new British protectorate (a country as large as one-third of India) will go over to Islam, and in view of the fact that none of the missionary societies of the Baptist, Congregational, Methodist or Presbyterian Churches of Great Britain or Ireland feels itself at present able to do anything for the evangelization of the Sudan, we should rejoice if the Lord should enable the Free Churches of this country to join in a United Sudan Mission; and while we do not pledge our churches or societies to the support of such a mission, we should be glad to see it taken up by all the churches which are at present doing nothing for the evangelization of the Sudan." Thus the Sudan United Mission came into existence, and at the first meeting of the London Council of the new mission it was proposed by Dr. R. F. Horton that an expedition should be sent to the Upper Benue River and the Bauche Hill Country in North Nigeria, West Africa. This party arrived at the walled town of Wase on September 17, 1904, and near that town at the foot of the mighty rock they built the first mission station in that region. Through the visit of Dr. and Mrs. Kumm to the United States in 1906 the American branch of the S. U. M. was organized. The following autumn its first American missionaries were sent out to North Nigeria. The sphere allotted to the American branch is the district south of the Benue River; accordingly the party proceeded to Ibi and thence southward to Wukari, where they arrived December 1. A few weeks later, a station was opened in Donga, an important town on the Donga River, twenty-four miles east of Wukari. Both towns are strategic centers, and important work has grown up around them. Work has been carried on along four definite lines: evangelistic, educational, medical and industrial. Religious teaching has been imparted by daily services in the mission compounds, public preaching, house-to-house visitation and itinerating preaching tours in the districts.

Only the most elementary instruction has been given, but considerable interest has been manifested in the schools, and a growing appreciation is noticeable. The medical department has been popular from the very first, and over 3,000 simple treatments were given. The Sudan United Mission is meeting in a practical way the crisis in the Sudan, and is giving the younger generation, especially, an opportunity to get Christian education and religious training; but in order to grasp the great opportunities of to-day it needs support in a large and adequate way.

NATIVE CHRISTIANS AT WUKARI

General Notes

—THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT'S last method of dealing with the militant suffragettes was to raid the headquarters of the Women's Social and Political Union in Kingsway, London, arrest six leaders, and take possession of the books and documents of the organization. The prisoners were later charged before a magistrate with conspiracy under the Malicious Damages Act, and it was stated, on government authority, that proceedings would be taken against persons who subscribed to the funds of the militants, printed their literature or made inflammatory speeches. One immediate result of the raid was the suppression of the weekly paper, The Suffragette.

—FOUR FORMER NEW YORK police inspectors were committed on April 29 to prison on charges of criminal conspiracy brought by District Attorney Whitman. The inspectors were James E. Hussey, John J. Murtha, Dennis Sweeney and James F. Thompson. All were members of the New York police system which is charged with having been for years in league with criminals to defeat the objects of the law. The charges against the accused are complex, and include the participation of a graft fund which was used for police bribery in certain criminal cases. This last group of arrests and indictments marks practically the culmination of the campaign for the unearthing of the criminal element in New York's police force.

CONCERNING SOCIALS

A SERMON

BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS*

TEXT: "Now in this that I declare unto you I praise you not, that ye come together not for the better, but for the worse." I Cor. 11: 17

ST. PAUL is here speaking of a practice which was introduced into the church, not by divine authority, but in accordance with its Christian liberty. Like other congregations of the primitive church, these Corinthian Christians held so-called lovefeasts just before the administration of the Lord's Supper in their places of worship. They consisted in a common meal for the whole congregation, to which rich and poor alike brought their provisions and where all sat down together at a common board.

There was much to be said for this custom. It seemed to be in strict accordance with the original institution of the Lord's Supper, which had been preceded by the Passover meal of which our Lord and his disciples partook together.

There was also great beauty and propriety in this arrangement, for it showed the conviction of these Corinthian Christians that differences of birth and rank are not eternal, but temporal; and that the Gospel joins the several estates and classes of men together in equal fellowship. It emphasized the great truth, "One is your Master, even Christ Jesus; all ye are brethren." And again: "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free; there is neither male nor female, but ye are all one in Christ."

"Ye Come Into Condemnation"

There was also great practical utility in this arrangement; for in an age when social lines and class distinctions were much more sharply drawn than they are with us to-day, it brought servant and master, slave and free citizen together upon a common ground. It also tended to promote the mutual regard and fellowship of people who through the Gospel were now being knit together into the great family of Jesus Christ.

Besides, as the heathen were accustomed to have feasts and common meals, in connection with their sacrifices and worship, to which they invited their friends and acquaintances, these social, common meals of the church might be of practical benefit by keeping weak Christians away from such gatherings and entertainments of their heathen relatives and neighbors.

Now, what happened? These agapæ or lovefeasts—this most beautiful and appropriate custom of the primitive church—speedily degenerated into such a shameful abuse that St. Paul says: "Ye come together not for the better but for the worse." "Ye come together unto condemnation."

It would seem that these people, instead of waiting until a common meal could be arranged, each seized at once upon that portion which he had brought and ate it by himself or with the members of his own family. The rich made a bountiful feast and were "drunken" or filled, while the poor had a frugal bite and were hungry. The rich crowded into the foreground and made a display; the poor sat in some corner, if not angry and resentful, at least abashed and ashamed. The result was increased divisions and dissensions within the church and mocking criticism on the part of those who were without.

Meeting To-day's Social Needs

No doubt these Corinthians tried to check and reform these abuses. They did not succeed. The agapæ or social lovefeasts degenerated more and more. St. Peter mentions the presence of ungodly men at them, who degraded these feasts into worldly banquets. The heathen were not slow to seize upon and exaggerate this abuse; to accuse the Christians of wild license and immorality in connection with these social lovefeasts. Some of the most shameful accusations ever brought against the church of God were given an appearance of truth by reason of these abuses. Therefore, in the course of the second century, throughout many parts of the church, the agapæ were separated from the administration of the Lord's Supper, which was kept in the morning, fasting, while they were held in the evening. Finally, they were abolished altogether, and the great general councils of the church passed resolutions against them. They have never been revived. A deliberate effort in this direction was made in modern times, but it ended in dismal failure.

Now all of this may teach us some very important lessons regarding the social side of our present-day church life.

First, I notice that every church has full liberty and right to introduce such forms and ordinances and to arrange for the filling of such needs and requirements as may seem good to it. If we of this church wish to arrange a supper, a picnic, an outing, a social gathering or a festival, we have an undoubted right to do so. All of these things are left to our Christian freedom. Men may question our prudence and wisdom in doing these things; they may question the expediency and usefulness of such arrangements; they may question the manner in which they are conducted; but they cannot question our abstract right to do anything which is not plainly forbidden in the Word of God or which can be proved to be at variance with principles distinctly laid down in the holy Scriptures.

Just as the apostolic church, for reasons which seemed good to it, by arranging these agapæ or lovefeasts made provision for the social needs of its members, so may we make provision for any similar needs of our people. It may not be wise for us to do so. We may be making a mistake. But nobody can dispute our right to do as seems good to us in these things, without disputing the right of these Corinthian Christians to arrange these social meals.

While we have this right, we dare not forget that there is in all of these things an ever-present danger. "Common meals," says old Matthew Henry, "may be managed after a common manner, but religious feasts should be attended religiously." His distinction between the common and the religious, the secular and the sacred, is not a happy one. To a Christian, everything, even the most common, is religious. "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." To the worldly man, everything, even the most religious, is common. In the highest conceivable form of life, in the world to come, this distinction between the religious and common, the sacred and secular, the holy and profane, will be utterly wiped out. "The kingdoms of this world are to become the kingdoms of God and his Christ." But in this world there is an ever-present danger of making this invidious distinction and of Christian people "doing common things in a common manner."

The Spirit of the World

Now the Church of Christ meets this danger by carrying the spirit of Christ and his Gospel into every human activity and occupation. She insists that everything a Christian does in faith and in obedience to the ten commandments is a good work —a holy, religious act. She does not admit that certain days are holy and others less holy, but she urges the sanctification of all time. She does not admit that a certain class of Christian men is holy while other Christians are less holy, but she urges that all are priests and kings before God. She does not admit that certain deeds are holy and others less holy, but she urges that everything be sanctified by the Word of God and by prayer. She does not admit that certain gatherings and certain meals are holy while others are common and profane, but she urges that all meetings of Christian people are to be a gathering together in Christ's name, that he may be in the midst of them.

The world does the exact opposite. While the church strives to make everything religious and holy by putting her spirit into the most ordinary affairs and activities of life, the world strives to make everything worldly by putting her spirit into all occupations and doings of man. The Lord's day it makes like every other day by devoting it, not to the hearing of the Word, but to having a good time at some outing. Christian ministers, according to the world, are engaged, not in their Father's business with Christ, but in a calling or profession to gain a livelihood. A church feast or social gathering, in her eyes, is not an assembling of believers in the name of Christ, but a common meeting of people for social pleasure and the making of a little money. Instead of making every meal, with prayer and thanksgiving, to have a sacred character, she would eat and drink even the sacred Supper of our Lord in the spirit of her ordinary meals.

This was the trouble with these social lovefeasts of the Corinthian church. The world gradually succeeded in introducing its spirit into these gatherings. So far as the world had succeeded in doing this, these feasts had become worldly. And so fa as the church permitted this to be done, the churc had been overcome by the world.

St. Paul therefore says: "Ye come together n for the better, but for the worse." "In eatin every one taketh before other his own supper; an one is hungry, and another is drunken. Wha have ye not houses to eat and to drink in? despise ye the church of God, and shame them th have not? What shall I say to you? shall I prai you in this? I praise you not."

He calls to their mind the great purpose of t Lord's Supper, which he had received from t Lord and had given to them, which was to "show t Lord's death until he come." This purpose w being defeated by their worldly manner of keepir these social lovefeasts. He says: "When ye con together therefore into one place, this is not to e the Lord's Supper." And why not? Because th were bringing the world into the church. It w for them to bring the church into the world. B cause they were being overcome of the world. was for them to overcome the world. And if the abuses were not checked and their occasion remove the kingdom of God would inevitably sink back in a kingdom of this world. To avoid this danger, t entire church abolished the agapæ or lovefea altogether, doing away with them root and branc

What Is "Church Work"?

The application is plain: While we as Christi congregations have the undisputed right to ma provision for such needs as may become appare in our church life, even for purely social needs, must never forget that there is in all of these thin an ever-present danger. It may not be everywhe and immediately apparent, but it is there. Th always tend to introduce the spirit of the world ir the church. And when they do that, even thou they, like these social lovefeasts, emphasize the gre truth of Christian fellowship, keep Christian p ple from worldly amusements and have a distir religious aspect as seeming to serve a religi purpose, they, like the agapæ, must be condemn and avoided—not as being wrong in themselves, b as tending to promote wrong by promoting disc and dissension, lowering the spiritual tone of t church, giving occasion for scandal and causing t enemies of the church to jeer at the weakness of b members. No matter how innocent or well int tioned these arrangements may be, away with th if they tend toward evil rather than good.

"Whatsoever things were written aforetime w written for our learning, that we through patie and comfort of the Scriptures might have hop Surely it is for us to learn and profit by the expe ence of these Corinthian Christians, as recorded us by the Holy Spirit. You will agree with when I say that one of the weaknesses of our pr ent-day church life is the emphasis of what might call social over spiritual Christianity. Thi have come to such a pass that Christian people arranging socials, entertainments, sales, baza and suppers, with the soliciting of advertiseme and selling of tickets, "church work." There Christian congregations which are conducted on lines of a social club, rather than a house of God

The Modern Danger

What is the result? People are making "soc bility" the condition of their membership in a tain church. The members are "so sociable." I the same reason they will refuse to join anot Its members "are not sociable." Meanwhile th are forgetting that the only work of the chu really enjoined upon it by its Lord is the evangel tion of the world through the preaching of Gospel. That and that only is required of it. A that is all that I may ask of it. To join a church sociability rather than for this reason, that it c fesses the truth in which I hope to find my so salvation, is to introduce the world into the chur And that, I fear, is the tendency of all these soci festivals, bazaars and sales which are such a f ture of our present-day church life.

So the warning and rebuke of St. Paul applies us with even greater force than to this Corinth congregation. I beg of you not to misunderst me. I frankly admit that a supper or social gath ing of Christian people is not in itself a wrong

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, May 18. Matthew 5: 21-26. Our Lord always leads us to the secret, innermost roots of things. He does not concern himself with symptoms but with causes. He does not begin with the molten lava flowing down the fair mountain slope and destroying the vineards. He begins with the central fires in which the lava is born. He does ot begin with uncleanness. He begins with the thoughts which produce . He does not begin with murder, but with the anger which causes it. le pierces to the secret fires!

Now all anger is not of sin. The apostle Paul enjoins his readers to "be ngry, and sin not." To be altogether incapable of anger would be to ffer no antagonism to the wrongs and oppressions of the world. "Who s made to stumble, and I burn not?" cries the apostle Paul. If wrong talked abroad with heedless feet he burned with holy passion. There is nger which is like clean flame, clear and pure, as "the sea of glass ningled with fire." And there is anger which is like a smoky bonfire, and t pollutes while it destroys.

It is the unclean anger which is of sin. It seeks revenge, not righteousness. It seeks "to get its own back," not to get the wrong-doer back to God. It follows wrong with further wrong. It spreads the devil's fire. t destroys more of God's treasures, and converts fair gardens into leserts, and temples into dust-heaps.

MONDAY, May 19. Genesis 43: 1-14. I am sure that in all these sorrowful days Jacob's thoughts were continually recurring to the old days when he wronged his brother Esau. These family dislocations would sharpen his remembrance of the former dislocation caused by his own sin. The Lord mercifully uses the waters of sorrows to wash out the stains of past sins. The angel was troubling the waters, but the troubled pools were the ministries of purity and healing. "The Lord is King at the flood," sings the psalmist. And so it is in the flood-times of the soul: The tears of the saints are the symbols of cleansing: their very griefs are made the helpers of salvation.

And sure I am that through all these sorrowful days the brothers never had Joseph out of their minds. If in the soul of their father the sorrow was as purifying waters, in the souls of the brothers it was "as consuming fire." To forgiven Jacob sorrow purified the heart: to the unforgiven brothers sorrow inflamed the conscience. Trouble drove Jacob nearer to God: the same trouble made the brothers afraid of God. They must first of all be goaded before they could find peace. First there must be the harrow before they could have the harvest.

In all this the Lord was working. He was behind the scenes, but his hand was in everything. "Thy God reigneth!" It is his hand that guideth every wave of the sea that breaks upon the shore.

TUESDAY, May 20. Genesis 43: 15-25. Here is fear misreading circumstances. Fear perverts everything into a preparation for bondage. Every favor is regarded as a glittering chain. A guilty conscience sees bogies at every corner. Every sound becomes the footfall of vengeance. Every knocking is the officer of law at the door! Joseph's brothers were agitated by an inflamed conscience, and the most innocent occurrence was as the approach of doom. The entry into the palace was the passage into prison.

A quiet conscience is the only true lens of observation. When conscience is abused and excited it becomes like bottled glass. I was once in a little cottage whose one window looked down the village street. One of the panes was humped up in confusion, jumbled into a knot, out of all simplicity. I looked through that pane, and everything in the village was rendered monstrous and grotesque. So is it with an evil conscience: it is a crooked and knotted pane which is the enemy of all true reflection. The man with the vile conscience sees a church in the mist, and he thinks it a crouching lion.

To have "a conscience void of offense" is to have cool, true sight. Needless fears will not terrify. There are no bogies in the street. No ghosts shrink from one's yesterdays or his to-morrows.

WEDNESDAY, May 21. Genesis 43: 26-34. What a blessed thing it is that our emotion sometimes breaks through all restraints! We observe little conventions, and we practice little reticences, and then our natural emotion washes them all aside as the advancing tide sweeps away the sand barriers built by the children along the shore! Joseph was carrying out his carefully invented plans, but his natural emotion burst through like some strong spring rising through a heap of gravel. When he saw Benjamin the fountains of the deep were broken!

It is so with the emotion of love. People who have prided themselves on their self-control suddenly find all their ordered carefulness submerged like dikes before the onrush of a glorious sea. They "fall in love," and all their exquisite plans are overthrown. It is even so with the emotion of joy. Some people seem ashamed to give it expression. A man once remonstrated with me for using the word "merry" in the pulpit! "It savored too much of the world!" All his joy was locked up as in some inner prison. But one day it burst its way out, and what a transformation it made! His liberated emotion saved his spiritual life.

So it is well to pray for full and active emotions. Let us pray that these "springs of being" may be kept fresh and wholesome. Let us pray that rivers "may break forth in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys."

THURSDAY, May 22. Philemon 10-18. The apostle Paul declares that benefits may be given in one of two ways—"of necessity," and "willingly." One is mechanical, the other is spontaneous. I once saw a little table-fountain playing in a drawing-room, but I heard the click of its machinery, and the charm was gone! It had to be wound up before it would play, and at frequent periods it "ran down." A little later I saw another fountain playing on a green lawn, and it was fed from the deep secret resources of the hills!

There is a generosity which is like the drawing-room fountain. If you listen you can hear the mechanical click, and a sound of friction, arising from murmuring and complaint. And there is a generosity which is like the fountain that is the child of the hills. It is clear, and sweet, and musical, and flows on through every season! One is "of necessity": the other is "willingly." And "God loveth a cheerful giver."

And prayer can be of the same two contrary orders. One prayer is mechanical, it is hard, formal, metallic. The other is spontaneous, forceful and irresistible. Listen to the Pharisee: "Lord, I thank thee that I am not as other men are." It is the click of the machine! Listen to the publican: "God be merciful to me a sinner!" It is the voice of the deeps. "I tell you, this man went down to his house justified rather than the other."

FRIDAY, May 23. I Peter 3: 8-17. "Be ye all of one mind." But this is not unison: it is harmony. When an orchestra produces some great musical masterpiece, the instruments are all of one mind, but each makes its own individual contribution. There is variety with concordance: each one serves every other, and the result is glorious harmony. "By love serve one another." It is love that converts membership into fraternity: it is love that binds sons and daughters into a family.

Look at a field of wild flowers. What a harmony of color! And yet what a variety of color! Nothing out of place, but no sameness! All drawing resource from the same soil, and breathing the vitalizing substance from the same air! "And ye, being rooted and grounded in love," will grow up, a holy family in the Lord. If love be the common ground the varieties in God's family may be infinite!

And so the unity which the apostle seeks is a unity of mood and disposition. It is not a unity which repeats the exact syllables of a common creed, but a unity which is built of common trust, and love, and hope. It is not sameness upon the outer lips, but fellowship in the secret place.

SATURDAY, May 24. Romans 12: 9-18. Love finds her joy in seeing others crowned. Envy darkens when she sees the garland given to another. Jealousy has no festival except when she is "queen of the May." But love thrills to another's exaltation. She feels the glow of another's triumph. When another basks in favor her own "time of singing of birds is come!"

And all this is because love has wonderful chords which vibrate to the secret things in the souls of others. Indeed, the gift of love is just the gift of delicate correspondence, the power of exquisite fellow-feeling, the ability to "rejoice with them that do rejoice, and to weep with them that weep." When, therefore, the soul of another is exultant, and the wedding-bells are ringing, love's kindred bells ring a merry peal. When the soul of another is depressed, and a funeral dirge is wailing, love's kindred chords wail in sad communion. So love can enter another's state as though it were her own.

Our Master spake condemningly of those who have lost this exquisite gift. They have lost their power of response. "We have piped with you, and ye have not danced: we have mourned with you, and ye have not lamented." They lived in selfish and loveless isolation. They had lost all power of tender communion.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

nful thing. On the contrary, it may be as well-ıtentioned and painstakingly designed to serve real need as were the Corinthian agapæ.

But, I repeat, there is in all of these things an ver-present danger. They invariably tend to introuce a worldly spirit into the church. While they ıay not immediately result in irregularities, divisions, dissensions, scandals and offenses, their tendency is ever in that direction. Therefore, it beooves us to be on our guard. It would seem, from he experience of the primitive church, that it is lmost impossible to check and correct these abuses fter they once appear. If permitted to go on unhecked their increasing worldliness inevitably succeeds in conforming the kingdom of God and his Christ to the kingdom of this world.

In conclusion, let me say this: When your pastor, prompted by anxious solicitude for the spiritual life of the church, finds it necessary to speak to you of these things, even as St. Paul here says to these Corinthians, "Ye come together not for the better, but for the worse," do not, I beg of you, meet him by an appeal to your rights. Do not immediately say: "It is not a sin. I see no wrong in it."

It is not a question of your abstract right to do these things; it is a question of the wisdom and prudence of doing them. The holding of these agapæ was no sin. On the contrary, there was much more to be said for them than for many of our present-day suppers, sales and bazaars. Yet, when St. Paul wrote to these Corinthians, pointing out dangers and abuses which were only half apparent to these people themselves, I am sure they gladly received and profited by his warnings.

May I not ask as much of you? Let me urge you to take to heart the practical lessons taught us by the experience of these Corinthian Christians with their social lovefeasts, that we may ever strive in all things to "make our faith the victory which overcometh the world."

THE SUMMER GOSPEL CAMPAIGN

DR. FRANCIS E. SMILEY SPEAKING TO A MIDNIGHT CROWD IN MADISON SQUARE, NEW YORK CITY

AVERY active and earnest propaganda in connection with evangelical and other religious bodies will be waged throughout the country during the coming summer. Promoters are now busy in getting their forces together and outlining the chief features of the campaign which has already begun in several centers.

Many of the best known clergymen both in the United States and Canada as well as several from London will lend their services to the cause. This year an unusually large number of specially trained workers will actively co-operate.

Back of the movement and supplying the greater part of the necessary financial support are many of the leading business and professional men, bankers, capitalists, manufacturers, and others from divers ranks of society, who are desirous that the Gospel be carried to the unchurched multitudes at home.

As in former years, New York will take a prominent part in the movement this summer. There is a wide area to be covered and much work to be done. Out of a cosmopolitan population of 5,000,000 in the greater city, it is claimed that only one in twenty attends church regularly and that a much lesser number are active church members; so it can be seen readily that a mighty labor of love must be undertaken to bring the Gospel into the hearts and homes of the non-churchgoing people of the metropolis.

The Evangelistic Committee of New York, which has its headquarters at 541 Lexington Avenue, is preparing for a season of great activity. Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Smith, superintendent of the work, last year paid a visit to the chief evangelistic centers of England, Ireland and Scotland to note how the work of reaching the masses was carried on in those countries. There are more lay workers in comparison over there than here, and a great deal of good has resulted from their efforts. Dr. Smith lays stress on the necessity of laymen entering the field here, especially young men, energetic, enthusiastic, imbued with the Christ spirit and eager for the salvation of souls.

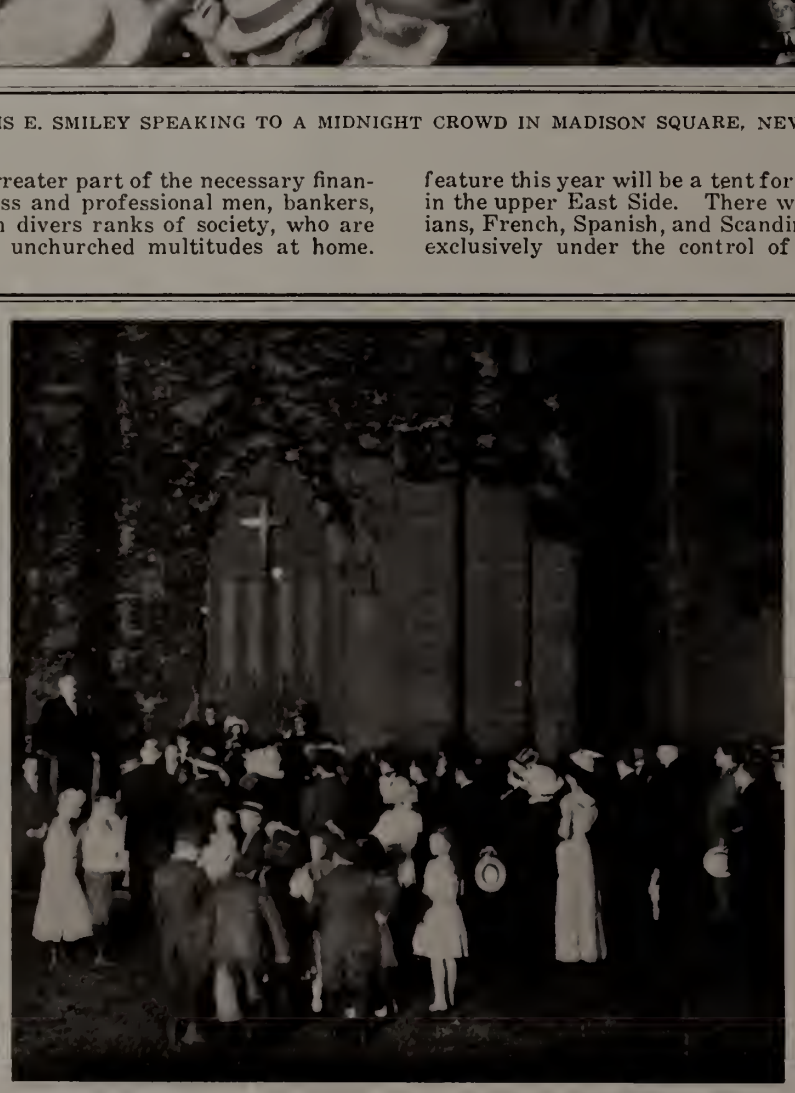
At the Lexington Avenue headquarters every year a certain number of young men receive a six weeks' preparatory course of training. They are addressed by experienced clergymen and missionaries, who instil the proper spirit and show them the way to carry on active evangelistic work among the masses. Last year fifty were so trained and the result their labors were satisfactory. young men on Su evenings held ings outside diff churches, and b the season ended crowds came to them and many converted. This a similar pro will be carried but on a more tended scale. young evangelist deliver the messa different section the city, and i hoped that a g harvest will be re from their labors.

There will be large Gospel tent various points of tage throughout metropolis. A sp feature this year will be a tent for Hungarians, of whom there is a large co in the upper East Side. There will also be special tents for Bohemians, ians, French, Spanish, and Scandinavians. An unique departure will be a exclusively under the control of lay workers. The attendance at the meetings last year aggregated 421,

Shop meetings will be held at the hour daily except Saturdays and days for the purpose of reaching working classes. These meetings be conducted in various languages, cording to locality and general roundings, and an effort will be mad segregate the different trades crafts so that each can be addre separately. Special meetings will held for the department store ployees, for clerks and bookkeepers, electricians, for ironworkers, for br layers and masons, for carpenters joiners, for cigar-makers, teamst bakers, chauffeurs and railroad men.

Open-air meetings will also be hel available locations for the general lic. In addition to lay workers, pro nent clergymen from time to time address these meetings.

The National Bible Institute, Fifth Avenue, has several mission the city which are exerting a good fluence. Meetings will be held daily half a dozen centers. The old T Evangel will this season enter upon thirty-fourth year of service. It have a seating capacity of two thous and be located on West One Hund and Twenty-fourth and One Hund and Twenty-fifth Streets, near M ingside Avenue. The character of work will be Bible Conference Tea ings and Evangelism for adults children. In connection with the T Evangel there will be an automobile ligious service, and it is expected t from this pulpit on wheels fifteen th sand will daily hear the Gospel.



A SUMMER EVENING MEETING IN FRONT OF "OLD FIRST" PRESBYTERIAN ON FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

THE THREE THAT FELL

SO THE sparrow dropped when it was hit by the twig thrown by a thoughtless child.

The sad-faced Man in dusty garb stooped and picked it up. It lay in his hand with closed eyes, as though it were dead. The Man smoothed its rumpled feathers. All at once it quivered, its eyes opening brightly. The Man unclosed his hand, whose palm showed signs of olden injury. The bird, with a happy chirp, flew up and joined other winged creatures of the blue. The Man gazed after it.

"Are not four sparrows sold for a farthing?" he murmured, and took his way from the wood where he had picked up the bird.

He had to pass through a field on his road cityward. In the field many white lambs gamboled among green growing things. Suddenly they started and scurried away. All save one. This one fell, bleating, lame from a blow of a stick thrown by a thoughtless youth. The Man saw it and gathered it in his arms, tenderly touching its hurt. After a while the Man put it down, but it was no longer lame, and it nibbled at the grass.

"Feed my lambs," the Man said, and went on.

THE dew on the grass and herbs bathed his feet, which were so ill shod that here and there the skin was disclosed, and on it the marks of one-time hurts. The day was fair, and he raised his eyes to the sky. "Even as Thou gavest him authority over all flesh," he said, "that whatsoever thou hast given him, to them he should give eternal life."

Then he looked earthward once more, and in a little while he found the city's outskirts and many evidences of men's labor—factories, mills, carts, and the like. People passed by him, noticing him not, or criticizing his appearance—careless and desperate people, or those bent on excitement.

THEN he was in the place of noise and worry—huge buildings given over to toil, rattling wagons, smoke and murk. In a street there was a gathering of people. The Man went that way. There lay a sodden woman in the dust, men and youths and small children looking at her and laughing; ladies in fine raiment passing by with disdain. The Man leaned over the prostrate creature and raised her to her feet. She clung to him, weeping.

"I tripped," she said, "and the men called me names and would have thrown stones at me had you not come in time."

"Let him who is without sin cast the first stone," said he who had lifted her up, and he released his hold of her. She took a faltering step from his si

"Sparrow and lamb!" murmured the M "Woman, your life should be in better ways th those you have trod."

"I know," she sobbed. "And I shall try. there are marks of wounds on your brow; have n wofully used you, too?"

"Sister!" said the Man, and went on.

"A meddler!" said some of the men, as they d persed. "A silly meddler. Now she is gone."

For the woman had passed away from the m and youths and children who would still fell all f lorn and defenseless things that came their way.

AS for the Man, he was in the purlieus of the to amid the din and rush. He went into bywa and wretched courts and alleys. His eyes seem to search dark nooks and crannies where wound creatures might drag themselves for fancied safet

"A wounded sparrow, a wounded lamb, a wom in the dust!" he murmured. "Are they not as d to Him who made each of them?"

ROBERT C. V. MEYERS

THE BOUND BOY

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD

A Story in Two Parts, of Which This Is Part Two

BRIGHT and early the next day John built the fire, did his chores before Mrs. Palmer waked, pausing a moment to let the fresh innocence of the dewy dawning enter his [illegible] Then he ate his porridge, and went to the [illegible]ge, and took down the shutters, and was sit[illegible] on the step when his new master appeared. "[illegible]s looks promising," said Mr. Snow. "Now [illegible] go in and sweep out and put things to rights."

"Needs a good housecleaning here," said John, [illegible]cing about him. "Guess I'm the one to do it. Le[illegible] unner this 'ere counter, sir. I guess there's th[illegible]'s tossed there ain't ben teched sence Bates was [illegible]g."

"I wouldn't wonder," said the other. "All right. Y[illegible] go ahead. I ain't had time, and Steve's too to[illegible] up."

"I'll be seein' to it fum time to time," said John. "J[illegible]' look at that top shelf there—"

"Trumpery. Empty boxes. Ain't ben handled th[illegible] dozen years, this two dozen years."

"Begin to the top," said John, recurring to the su[illegible]ect after some instruction in weights and m[illegible]sures and prices and the doing up of bundles. "I[illegible]s rainin' a blue streak. Guess there won't be m[illegible]y folks in, sir." And he made his preparations as seriously as one might be setting out on a great undertaking whose issues were life and death. It w[illegible] a great undertaking. It was stripping off the so[illegible] from a beautiful thing long buried; it was cl[illegible]ring foul slander away from the whitest soul in [illegible]he whole world.

"A good thing here," said Erle Snow to himself. "I[illegible]t afraid of work. You're Mis'—Mis' Palmer's bo[illegible]nd boy, ain't you?" he asked. "She know yo're here?"

"I ain't told her yit," said John. "I done the w[illegible]k 'fore I come. She's give me my time fer my ov[illegible]."

The floor was swept, the counter and show-case w[illegible]ed off, the windows washed, and Mr. Snow saw wi[illegible] satisfaction the beginning of a sort of transformation in his premises. And at last John planted his ladder, and with brush and cloths mounted to the top shelf and blew down a hurricane of dust. "Here, what you doing?" came the call from below.

"Cleaning up, sir. Beginnin' to the top," John called in reply. "There's dust enough here to make a new earth."

"Guess you'd better leave it alone."

"W'y, it'd orter breed a fever! I wonder you folks be alive to-day. 'Tain't remarkable old Mr. Snow died." If Mr. Snow should order him down and out he wouldn't hear. And he went on moving box after box, and looking into pile after pile of old newspapers, and a huddle of odds and ends. And he clapped things together till he sneezed, and was fairly overlaid with a cloud of floating dust that became almost terrific in a sudden sunbeam. But it was all to no effect; there was nothing there that he sought.

He had put a penny in the till—the only one he had besides his dime, an ancient and valued pocket-piece, that penny—and had taken a pilot biscuit for his luncheon. And he was still ferretting in that top shelf, the ladder moved from point to point, when his employer returned from his dinner. "We're goin' to be clean here, tell ye what!" said John. And although Mr. Snow had a vague feeling that where there was no mind to be used one had a right to take advantage of the body, yet he told John to come down and take a rest. But nothing was farther from John's intention, and he rummaged on.

John was in no wise discouraged when the dark came, and Mr. Snow bade him good-night. There had not been many customers, even after the rain stopped and the sun came out, and John had descended the ladder but a few times. He already knew from long custom the price of almost everything in the store. "You've worked well," said Mr. Snow. And John took home the smoked herring he had meant to buy with his ten cents the night before. "Keep the dime," said Mr. Snow. "Why, John, you're welcome." But the dime went into the till. Nothing was to be accepted from the man who believed evil of Mis' Graham.

He was in gay spirits when he went into the house on the hill. He was doing something for the people who had done so much for him. He was doing something for Annie. Her mother was lighting the candle; John himself had gathered the May-berries for its fragrant flame. Its pale light seemed in his eyes to make a faint aureole round Annie's head as she sat there gentle, lovely, with her pathetic smile and her idle hands. She had been braiding the long rag-mat strips that Clary cut for her till she had used them all, and her hands were fallen in her lap, and her eyes looked—to John—as if because they were blind here they were given insight of the things near heaven. And John's heart was very tender towards her. So solitary, so sweet, so patient, and the man she had loved thought evil of her! He knew well that she had married Robin Graham only because no one could say nay to Robin Graham.

He handed to Mrs. Palmer the little parcel he brought. "They're mighty tasty with a roast potato," he said. He could not possibly have given such a thing outright to Annie. He did not put the dim idea into distinct thought, but what he felt was that only the fish broken by sacred hands to the multitude was offering fit for her.

John had a trifle of cold that night, and Mrs. Palmer had prepared some sage-tea and honey for his throat. He sat beside her, toasting his feet over the red coals. "W'ile you got bees, marm," he said, "you won't need to buy sugar. Sugar's gone up," proud in his new mercantile knowledge.

"Old times all folks had was honey," said Mrs. Palmer. "Bees is interessin' creeturs," she added reflectively.

"Mis' Graham ses they make the blows themselves serve useful pupposes."

ESPERANTO IS NOW WORLD-WIDE

BY PROFESSOR EDMOND PRIVAT OF GENEVA, SWITZERLAND

SINCE my last visit to this country in 1907, the international auxiliary language, Esperanto, has made wide progress both in Europe and in Asia. After landing here the other day, my first visit to an editorial office was to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which is always ready to help world-wide movements for the betterment of human relations and which was the first American magazine to organize a great national course of Esperanto by mail.

Six years ago the people who learned Esperanto did so because they approved of the idea of such an easy means of communication with the whole world, and because they thought that it would help not only business intercourse but also bring about a better understanding between nations until now divided by differences of language. Since then, Esperanto has gradually become established as a reality and the dreams have changed into facts. In all the cities of the world and even in many small towns (altogether more than twelve hundred) the Universal Esperanto Association has appointed Esperanto delegates and Esperanto consuls whose addresses are published in a most practical year-book and thousands of people are using their services regularly. People traveling in foreign countries send a postcard to the Esperanto delegate at the point where they wish to stop and they are met at the station and helped for hotel accommodation, guidance throughout the city, and indeed during their stay until they leave for another place. I traveled throughout Hungary, Russia and Poland last winter and, as I do not know a word of the languages of those countries, I should have been at a decided disadvantage without the help of our Esperanto consuls in places where I would have had difficulty in finding any one to converse with either in English or French.

The Founder of the Esperanto Movement

Last year two blind people, who would otherwise have been obliged to pay some one to accompany them, traveled alone all the way from Spain to the North of Germany and were helped at all points in the most efficient way by Esperantists, being met at the train on their arrival and never left until they were comfortably seated in the train for departure.

Last year the statistics of the Universal Esperanto Association registered 956 tourists or travelers using these gratuitous services. Anybody who has learned Esperanto—you know how easy it is—can have a similar experience. Even for one who does not travel abroad the organization offers a wide field of opportunities. You want to know something about a certain industry in Budapest, or to have information as to a particular business in some Russian town, or to know about the responsibility of a firm in Sofia, or to receive statistics of a church movement in Stockholm, or to get the address of the best schools in Tokyo—all these inquiries will be accurately answered by the Esperanto delegates of those places, providing you enclose the stamps or postal coupons for the replies. Last year 41,087 such inquiries were answered.

In the larger towns, there are, besides the Esperanto delegate, several Esperanto consuls, one for commerce, one for tourists, one for students and university inquiries, and also a lady consul (konsulino) who is specially entrusted with the reception of girl travelers. Parents apprise her by postal of the arrival of their daughter and she meets the young person at the station and gives her all needed help, protection and advice. There are also consuls whose sole task is to help young people to find posts or get information as to the value of advertised employment. Last year 588 young people were enabled to get good engagements abroad through these means. This international work of mutual helpfulness is a realization of the spirit of brotherhood which inspired Dr. Zamenhof to create Esperanto thirty years ago.

PROFESSOR EDMOND PRIVAT
One of the World's Leading Esperantists

Last year I had an interview with his majesty the king of Italy, and he expressed his high appreciation of the results obtained. He was greatly struck with the simplicity of the language. He thought it really did make it worth while for any one to learn Esperanto now, as it only takes a few weeks to master it. I saw, later on, the prime minister of Russia and the ministers of education of several other European governments. The international language is now taught in many schools of Europe, and the Chinese Government is organizing classes in Peking, Dr. Sun Yat Sen being himself an enthusiastic Esperantist.

The old walls of difficulties and misunderstandings between men of different languages are now being removed by the spread of the new language. One who learns it finds the whole world opened to him.

Any one who desires to communicate with me during my stay in the United States for further information concerning Esperanto may address me in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

OUR EDITORIAL FORUM

PRESIDENT OTTO KOENIG | MANAGING EDITOR GEO. H. SANDISON | SECRETARY THEODORE WATERS

"Stand Upright on Thy Feet"

AN INTERESTING editorial appeared in a recent number of the Continent on the subject: "Saving One's Own Soul." Issue was taken with the counsel frequently heard nowadays in such sentences as: "Don't bother about saving your own soul; that's selfish; think about other people." The editor justly and correctly holds that it is not selfish to seek to save one's own soul; and that, "if anybody proposes to serve God in cleaning up the world, the necessary point for him to begin is the nearest—with himself."

This is precisely the point of view THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has always taken, and the emphasis we have tried to maintain. What the whole world needs is salvation from sin; and this implies that men, one by one, definitely give themselves up to God to be saved. All the splendid exhortations to social service, to unselfish living, to welfare and uplift work are calls that should be obeyed. But what the human soul and the human race need is God—and the salvation of society can only come as men, one by one, find him.

What we wish particularly to emphasize here, however, is the thought suggested in another sentence from the editorial referred to: "The soul which sees its first and most inevitable obligation to be the squaring of its own purposes and acts with God's will, adopts a principle of life which is in itself most unselfish." The point is that this whole matter of the saving of one's own soul is elementary. It is the kindergarten of Christian experience. It is the entrance upon the race course, not the course itself.

So that the advice which the Continent justly condemns when given to unconverted persons, becomes correct and sane when spoken to out-and-out Christians: "Don't bother about saving your own soul; think about other people." Christ commanded the disciples to "tarry" until they should be endued with power from on high, but after they had been thus baptized with fire they were to "Go!" Dr. Torrey tells about that tragic day in his own life when he determined that he would not go into his pulpit to preach again until he had received the baptism with the Holy Spirit. He "tarried" then till the blessing came; since then he has been busy "going."

That is the normal motion of the Christian: not kneeling but going. There must, of course, be much prayer, but as his experience grows his prayer will be less and less for self and constantly more for others. Paul counted his friendship with Jesus the one priceless treasure of his life, yet he declared he could wish himself accursed from Christ that his brethren might be saved.

So long as there is misery and sin and cruelty and injustice anywhere in the world the Christian should be swift and strong to bring relief and hope and salvation. He is to be a flaming herald, rebuking wrong, trampling down injustice, announcing the glad tidings of the salvation of the Son of God and the brotherhood of man.

"Stand upright on thy feet!" cried Peter, stretching out his hand to the impotent man. So we would shout to timid, hesitating, doubting Christians everywhere. Stop doubting God and begin to trust him. He declares he has forgiven your sins. Believe it, and forget them. He says he will cleanse your heart. Accept it, and rejoice. He says he will equip you with Holy Ghost power for your work. Take it by faith, and put the power he gives you to the test. This is no age for cloistered sainthood.

The Son of God goes forth to war,
A kingly crown to gain;
His blood-red banner streams afar.
Who follows in his train?

Mr. Bryan's Mission

WHILE there may be different views regarding the outcome of Secretary Bryan's mission to California, it was an effort well meant, and there is every reason to believe that it has not been altogether wasted. If the changes in the alien land bill are such as to bring it more into conformity with our treaty with Japan, and omit any phraseology that would have been quite needlessly objectionable, they will very likely result in the whole question being now in a fair way to become one of diplomacy exclusively. Thus Mr. Bryan's efforts will have opened the way to a friendly adjustment, possibly under a new or amended treaty, satisfactory to both nations. It is regrettable that there should be a disposition, in any quarter, to make a sensation out of the California land question. Even the Japanese themselves, if we may judge from public sentiment in that country, see nothing in it to disturb the mutual good feeling existing between the two governments. They are far more interested in keeping Japanese capital at home than in facilitating its investment abroad. Besides, they rely on our fair treatment of the whole question and may be depended on to do what they can to that end. Treaties are not made of straw, to be broken at will; and we believe that where the nation's honor and sense of righteousness are involved, the unreasoning cry of the jingo will quickly dwindle to impotent appeal.

More War Clouds in Europe

NEITHER the fall of Adrianople nor of Scutari has brought peace to the troubled Balkans. Turkey is quiescent, it is true, but Montenegro's course in defying the Powers by refusing to relinquish Scutari and by assenting to the erection of Albania into a petty monarchy with Essad Pasha, the defender of Scutari, as king, has sadly complicated matters and driven the European concert into a state of lamentable discord. Austria still threatens hostilities and may begin warlike operations against King Nicholas with or without foreign aid. Italy may put a force in the field to help her ally, but no step has yet been taken in that direction. If the Balkan alliance holds—which now seems rather doubtful, as there are reports of a quarrel between Bulgaria and Servia—the aged Austrian emperor may have a big contract ahead. France and Russia both strongly sympathize with Montenegro, and a very small revolution of the kaleidoscope may bring mighty forces on the field. However we view the situation, it is not a promising one for the peace of Europe.

The Recall in Early Greece

IN THE palmy days of the Greek republics, many centuries ago, as historians tell us, when a man rose to such a height of power or affluence that he became a possible menace to the State, the citizens took a vote on his case as an "undesirable." Abdul Hamid on Balkan War

ABDUL HAMID II, the deposed Sultan of Turkey, who begged for his life with tears in his eyes on his capture in his palace, and has preserved an eloquent silence since, has st aroused the attention of the world by his mem-rs edited and translated by Ali Babi Bey. Among her things he says: "I do not lament the fact that e have lost the Balkan lands, so difficult to govern nd so exhausting to our national strength. The etter shall we be able to concentrate ourselves astward, the speedier shall we recover from our ill-ess. Europe shall see that the 'Sick Man' she has ered at, when once he has healed himself from ithin, is a strong man." The ex-Sultan insists pon the construction of the Bagdad Railroad as ecessary to the nation's prosperity. He has this neer for the Turkish officers educated in Germany: The old qualities of the Osmanlis—simplicity and lf-denial—are too often lost sight of by our youth Germany. What they do learn—and well, too—immorality and drinking, etc. Returning as in-ated windbags, they look down haughtily on their omrades, on the old tried generals, and hold our stoms up to ridicule. Shall I tell you what makes good soldier? A goodly allowance of common ense, pluck and endurance, nd above all, a firm, unwa-ering faith in Allah." The lurs of Abdul Hamid at the Young Turks that deposed im are bitter. It was only hercenary motives that led he nations of Europe so long o tolerate the crimes against he Christians about which Gladstone cried out so elo-uently. The long knife whet-ed to a keen edge for the ssault on Christians has ust stabbed to death Turkey n Europe. It was good ad-ice given to withdraw to Asia for national plans, ac-ivities and hopes, for Mo-hammedanism with its twin levils of slavery and polyg-my must hide itself farther way from the light to have ny little lease of life left. The memoirs contain this int of the old butcher: "We must cease thrusting further horns into our flesh by im-porting alien religionists. Within the limits of our state only men of our race and creed are to be tolerated." The Sick Man can never get well. Mohammendanism is against the spirit of the age and the decree of God. The mosque will give place to the Christian church, the Crescent will fade in the brightness of the Cross. This is the declaration of the prophet echoed by Paul:

As I live, saith the Lord, every knee shall bow to me, and every tongue shall confess to God. (Rom. 14: 11.)

Singular Reward of Honesty

A WEALTHY man who died in Brussels recently left much of his large fortune to a girl who was unacquainted with him. He was very eccentric, and, like Diogenes, he set out to find an honest man. His tub was an omnibus and his lantern a small coin. In the omnibus he took his seat near the conductor and always showed himself very obliging, passing up the money of passengers and returning the change, but to the latter he always managed to add a franc or half-franc. Then he would watch those to whom it came. They would count it carefully, notice the extra coin, and invariably slip it into their pockets. But at last a young woman passed hers back, with "Conductor, you have given me half a franc too much." The man followed her to her home, learned what he could about her, and made his will in her favor, though he never told her that the half franc returned would bring her a million. The man was so eccentric that it is a question whether the courts, if tested, would hold the sanity of the will, and yet two lessons are taught by the incident: one that many people will take from the public conveyances by the retail in wicked return for the amounts many of the public conveyances take from the people by the wholesale, and the other is that honesty carries with it its own priceless reward. The reward is not always in money, although material reward usually attends integrity. But the consciousness of a pure spirit is a richer reward than money. The apostle enjoins this strict integrity in these words:

Now I pray to God that ye do no evil; not that we should appear approved, but that ye should do that which is honest. (II Cor. 13: 7.)

Railroad Accident in Africa

BY a cablegram the other day from Boma, Belgian Congo, the news of a railway accident was announced. A train was crossing an arm of the Congo when the bridge gave way and the train fell a distance of 150 feet into the river and the three train men and twenty passengers were drowned. Not a person escaped. We see in the train the progress of civilization. We see the perils of civilization in the breaking of the bridge and destruction of precious lives. The mile-a-minute train is the perfection of transportation, and yet despite its signals and careful management it is liable to accident. A ship in the South Pacific by a collision sinks and a thousand brave soldiers go down; a greyhound of the sea in the North Atlantic strikes an iceberg and sends sixteen hundred to a watery grave. Wheels facilitate commerce and promote pleasure, and yet they kill in New York City an average of one person each day. Yet we must have the civilization. But its risks can and must be reduced. That bridge over the Congo doubtless had some parts weakened by rust and wear. The laws of all countries are demanding better inspection of all agencies that have peril in them. The one lesson the fatal train teaches us and to which busy people pay little attention is that of the brevity of life and the necessity of preparation for the future. It was after mentioning this uncertainty of life that Christ said:

Therefore be ye also ready; for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh. (Matt. 24: 44.)

Threshing Uncut Grain

THE little hand sickle gave way to the cumbersome cradle with its sharp knife and long wooden fingers, and the cradle was hung up in the old barn or in the forks of a tree to rust, to make room for the harvester with the horses to draw and then with the steam to propel it. A new invention has just entered the field which threatens to send the reaping machines of all kinds to the scrap heap. It goes into the harvest field and threshes the uncut grain, leaving the standing stems to be turned under by the plow as a most valuable fertilizer. It is claimed that the new invention will save the farmers of America alone at least $200,000,000 a year. In the new thresher "a strong blast of air from a revolving fan is blown against the standing grain and forces it against a toothed cylinder which tears off the grain, depositing it in a trough, from which it is elevated by an auger to another toothed cylinder, which re-threshes it. The chaff is blown out and the clean grain falls into a sack, or maybe through a tube to a wagon driven alongside. Four horses pull the thresher over the field, and a small gasoline engine operates the machine." Only two men are required in the process, one to take care of the horses, the other to tie up the sacks of the grain. The cost of cutting and sacking the various grains of the country amounts to $210,000,000 a year. By the new process it will cost but $30,000,000, only a seventh of the amount, leaving a saving to the farmer of an enormous fortune in itself. The new threshing machine has been in operation three years. Last fall it threshed and sacked about thirty acres of wheat in a single day of ten hours. The farmers have invested so much money in their harvesters and threshers that they will continue to use them, and only lay them aside when longer time and experimentation shall have demonstrated the validity of the claims of the new machine. In these days of the conservation of energy and of wonderful progress in agricultural implements, it seems but natural that a thresher should be invented that can go into the field of standing grain and do its work there. There was no improvement made in the method of threshing grain for six thousand years until comparatively recent times. Gray-headed farmers living now can remember when the chaff was separated from the grain by the same process as when the prophet wrote:

The oxen likewise and the young asses that ear the ground shall eat clean provender, which hath been winnowed with the shovel and with the fan. (Isa. 30: 24.)

Toil Till Death

A DELEGATION of forty-seven schoolboys from San Francisco visited the White House the other day. President Wilson presented them an American flag and made them a little speech in which he said, "You think schoolmasters are often a bit hard on you in requiring you to do things in order that you may pass the tests of school; but I want to warn you that when you get out of the school you are going to have harder schoolmasters than you had before. The world requires that we make good, no matter what happens, and the man who does things amounts to a great deal more than the man who wishes he had done things and who promises he will do things. The men I am sorry for are those who stop and think that they have accomplished something before they stop at the grave itself. You have got to have your second wind in this world and keep it up until the last minute." The truth given to the boys was all-important: that the adverse tides of this life are so strong that the hardest rowing is required to the very last; that there are racers on the track so many and swift that there must be endurance to the end; that the enemies are so numerous and powerful that the fight must be maintained to the finish. It was peculiarly fitting that Mr. Wilson should give the school children the advice he did. For after working his way up from the poverty of a parsonage to the head of a great university, the governorship of a State, and the Presidency of the United States, he found that his promotions, instead of bringing him ease and inactivity, only brought to him more intense labors and perplexing problems for solution. The principle of persistency as a necessary element of success in life is particularly so in the religious realm. Temptation follows men and women to the verge of the grave. This great truth is expressed in this injunction:

Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life. (Rev. 2: 10.)

DUBUQUE'S SUNDAY SCHOOL FESTIVAL

WHO said it was no fun to go to Sunday school? Whoever it was he did not live in Dubuque. Sunday school going in that city includes much more than the ordinary program. There is plenty of enthusiasm and pleasure all through the year and, of course, the perennial delights of Christmas. But it is in summer, when Sunday school enthusiasm in other places is apt to wane, that the Sunday school hosts of Dubuque really come into their own. There will be held this year the fifth annual Sunday school pageant, which includes not only a monster parade, at which prizes are distributed for those making the bravest showing, but a picnic dinner at Union Park and an athletic program with worth while prizes for which boys and girls, men and women all compete. Some idea of the size, dignity and splendor of the parade may be gathered from the contemplation of last year's line of march. It looks as business-like and martial as any military or political display.

A SUNDAY SCHOOL FESTIVAL AT THE UNION PARK PLAYGROUNDS

ONE OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL FLOATS

City Police; Chief Marshal, L. O. Hillyard.

FIRST DIVISION—Marshal, Willis Dexter; Cuba City Military Band; Y. W. C. A.; Y. M. C. A.; St. John's Episcopal Church; Salvation Army; St. Luke's Methodist Episcopal Church; St. Mark's Lutheran Church; St. Peter's Lutheran Church; Summit Congregational Church.

SECOND DIVISION—Marshal, James Cameron; Dubuque Military Band; Sunshine Mission; Third Presbyterian Church; Westminster Presbyterian Church; Zion's Church; Center Grove Methodist Episcopal Church; Rockdale Methodist Episcopal Church; Reed's Chapel Methodist Episcopal Church; East Dubuque Methodist Episcopal Church.

THIRD DIVISION—Marshal, Dwight Phelps; Dubuque Moose Band; First Baptist Church; West Hill Church; First Congregational Church; German Methodist Episcopal Church; German Presbyterian Church; Grandview Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church; Immanuel Church; Jackson Street Methodist Episcopal Church.

The floats prepared by the various organizations were the chief feature of the parade. It was a difficult matter for the judges to decide where the prizes should go. But the final award gave the first prize to St. Peter's English Lutheran Sunday school, while the second went to the Westminster Presbyterian Sunday school. The St. Peter's float was decorated in light blue and white and drawn by two pure-white horses. Children of the school were seated in the float, each holding the church pennant. The Westminster float represented an arbor in a vineyard. The float itself and the arbor were of white, covered with light green trimming and foliage. The children were dressed in white and seated in rows on the float, each holding a small flag. The St. Luke's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school exhibit was especially gorgeous. The float was entitled "America Receiving the Nations."

Miss Edna Wood, representing America, was seated upon a high throne and held ribbons which were grasped by young ladies costumed to represent the different nations of the world. This Sunday school exhibited also another float decorated in purple and white and containing the children of the primary department, each holding an American flag. A drill team composed of sixteen young men from the German Methodist Church marched in the figure of a cross, making a most impressive and manly appearance.

Forty trolley cars conveyed the paraders to Union Park. There was a merry hour before dinner was served at twelve. The athletic program began at two and made a merry ending to the bright day. While scores of people deserve all sorts of credit for the successful affair, three men deserve special mention as those who bore the most responsible share of the work. They were Mr. L. L. Lightcap, president of the general committee; Mr. John E. Hedley, secretary and treasurer of the committee, and Mr. A. D. Schiek, assistant secretary and treasurer. The 1913 pageant will be held during the last week of June.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that this Dubuque idea could be carried out with most gratifying results in every city and large town. What can be done to spread the movement and thus help to convince again the young people of America that the very happiest hours of their lives and the finest opportunities for both profit and pleasure are those spent under the guidance and influence of Christ's church?

RENTS AND THE HIGH COST OF LIVING

THE interest in lowering rents is as wide as the interest in the high cost of living. To be sure, New York City has suffered more from high rents than any other city in the country, and the Lower Rents Exhibit, which has been open in Union Square, Manhattan, during the past few weeks, has illustrated most markedly the terrible burden of rents in that city, since they take from a fifth to a quarter of the earnings of most of its population.

The general appreciation of this burden of rents is shown by the fact that over 83,000 people visited the exhibit.

Nearly every renter in the United States pays from one-fourth to one-third more rent than he would pay if land values were more heavily taxed and buildings were untaxed. The small home-owner is penalized in about the same proportion for his malevolent aspiration to own his own home.

The Lower Rents Exhibit has shown by cartoons, placards, diagrams and many special features just how every class of tenants and home-owners of the city is burdened by the present system of taxing buildings at the same rate as land values.

Perhaps the most striking demonstration of the disproportionate cost of rent is the three-room apartment, such as ordinarily rents for about $180 a year in most parts of New York City, except the outlying sections, which has been completely furnished for about one-half the annual rental.

The unfair division of the ground rentals between the people who create the land values, that is, the people of the city, and the land-owners, is illustrated by a diagram entitled "The Great Divide." This shows that while the increase in land values of the city, annually, is about $100,000,000, and the annual ground rental about $260,000,000, making a total of $360,000,000, the city recovers by taxation only about $84,000,000, leaving $276,000,000 for the fortunate mortals who hold title deeds to the land of New York City.

The exhibit is designed primarily to educate the public on the land question, but its immediate object is to secure support for the bill now before the New York Legislature, submitting to a referendum vote at this fall's election the question of gradually reducing the tax rate on all buildings in New York City to one-half the tax rate on all land by a series of five equal reductions in as many consecutive years. It is generally admitted that this moderate measure will reduce rents by at least 10 per cent. a year, and probably by much more, and would give the same degree of relief to the owners of small homes.

A bitter fight is being waged against this by land-owners of the city, whose influence upon the legislature has been hitherto unchallenged.

BIG BROTHERS*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE lesson story of the lovingkindness of Joseph as a great man for his little brother Benjamin suggests a broad discussion of Big Brothers of three kinds: 1. Real big brothers who are inspiring examples and faithful helpers to their little brothers and sisters. 2. Adopted big brothers of the juvenile court. 3. Adopted big brothers who keep boys and girls out of court. The lesson story is about the first-named kind of big brothers.

We need not repeat here the beautiful story of Joseph and Benjamin except to recall that when Joseph was but seventeen years of age he was separated from Benjamin, his only full brother, born of the same mother. The other brothers were only half-brothers in blood, and not half brothers in love. About thirteen years had passed since he had seen Benjamin. When his brothers came the first time to Egypt he had asked them, "Have ye yet another brother?" And when he learned that Benjamin was yet alive he had said that when they needed more grain they must bring this younger brother or they would come in vain. Jacob, supposing that Joseph had been slain long before when his brothers showed him his bloody coat, feared that Benjamin, his darling, might meet the same fate if he should be carried to Egypt, and so it was not until the danger of perishing with hunger compelled him to yield that he allowed Benjamin to go. Beautifully the Bible tells how at sight of Benjamin Joseph, the stately premier, went aside to weep for joy, and how at the feast that he gave his brothers, who as yet did not know who he was, he gave to Benjamin more and choicer food than to the others. Let us hope that by this time the older brothers had been cured of the folly of being jealous because an aged father loved best his youngest, the baby of the family. They should themselves have all been "big brothers" to the youngest, first to Joseph and later to Benjamin, seeking to protect their little feet against every peril to body and soul.

The Big Brother in the Home

The plain lesson is that older brothers and older sisters should faithfully help the little brothers and little sisters to get a good start in the way of life.

Alas, there is a rebuke in this lesson for the older boys and girls in many a home, because they have imposed upon their younger brothers and sisters, sometimes wronging them by physical abuse, oftener by a sharp tongue that sirs the youngest, as David's brothers, when Samuel came asking a king in the household, left David the youngest as of no account out among the sheep. In studies, in plays, in conversation, older brothers and older sisters should prove themselves inspiring examples and faithful helpers of their younger brothers and sisters. It is surprising how much quarreling there is among brothers and sisters. Most of it is soon over, but ought never to have begun. Some of these quarrels harden into grudges that darken for years the hearts that ought to be the best of friends.

The Bible has many strong warnings against hating and wronging our own brothers or any brother man. "He that hateth his brother is a murderer." "He that hateth his brother abideth in death." "If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how shall he love God whom he hath not seen?" "If thou bring thy gift to the altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee, leave there thy gift before the altar; first be reconciled to thy brother and then come and offer thy gift." These passages no doubt include more than real brothers, but they include those, and there are many who need to be reminded that it is a serious thing before God to hate a real brother—or even fail to love him and help him.

What a beautiful picture of true brotherhood it was when Andrew, the fisherman of Galilee, had found Jesus and immediately hastened to find his brother Peter and bring him to Jesus! There are many cases where a brother or sister has labored hard that a brother or sister might take a college course or a medical treatment. And sometimes even a little brother, when his father has died and left mother and the baby with no means of support, has become a "big brother" in love and courage and achievement. "Not to be ministered unto but to minister" should be the watchword of every big brother and big sister in the home.

Big Sisters as "Little Mothers"

"Little mother" is the favorite name of the big sister who takes good care of her little sister or brother. She should study to know how to care for the baby in sickness and in health, for babies are dying too fast—three hundred thousand in their first year in the United States, and thirty per cent. of all in the first five years. Most of these deaths, the doctors say, are due to the ignorance and carelessness of those who have the care of the little ones. If young girls will by reading and by inquiry learn now to be wise "little mothers," when they grow up they will be wise "big mothers," and there will be fewer little coffins. There is therefore a double reason why big sisters should become the best possible "little mothers" to their younger brothers and sisters. They should learn "first aid to the injured"; and why not give all young girls a course of lessons on care of their baby brothers for near and remoter benefits? This will be a way to help tired mothers at the same time.

One way to be of present usefulness and get a future reward also is to have a crèche in the church, where "little mothers" can take care of babies not only for their own mothers, but also for other mothers who can not otherwise attend church. And in mill towns, girls who are free from other cares can do good and at the same time learn lessons for future use by having a crèche in some church parlor or elsewhere where, with their own baby brothers and sisters, they can take care of the babies of mothers who must work in the mills.

That reminds me that the Young Men's Christian Association, in its new Bible studies for boys, finds that well informed Christian boys of sixteen to eighteen are often the best teachers of boys of twelve to fourteen; that is, the older adolescents, if real Christians and well trained in Bible study and methods of Christian work, are the best teachers for younger adolescents—their best "big brothers."

But we are getting away from real brothers to adopted "big brothers," of whom the greatest is the Elder Brother, as Jesus Christ is called. Let us all think of him as the "Big Brother," who, when we are found guilty in the court of God—guilty of sins of doing and not doing, of saying and not saying, of thinking and not thinking—said he would be responsible for us and secured for us not "suspended sentence," but canceled sentence, because he had in some way taken our place and made a way by which God could be just and yet merciful.

"Big Brothers" of the Juvenile Court

Joseph seems to be in many ways a type of Christ—one of them, the saying, "Ye shall not see my face except your brother be with you," suggesting that it is only through the merits of Jesus Christ that we are admitted to the presence of the King eternal, immortal, invisible. This brings us to the "big brother" of the juvenile court, who is thus seen to be a follower of Jesus in what he does for wayward boys.

When a young boy gets into court for some crime, he is usually to blame himself, but a part of the blame is on the family in that his parents or perhaps his big brothers at

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—"WHAT IS THE BEST book for superintendent or teachers in a Sabbath school? One that is the most instructive, with helps, and what is the cost?"—J. G. Ferris, Holley, N. Y.

Unhesitatingly we reply, How to Conduct a Sunday School, by Marion Lawrance.

Mr. Lawrance was made general secretary of the International Sunday School Association because of his great efficiency as a Sunday school superintendent in Toledo, Ohio. The management of his school and his plans of work were sagacious, and some of them quite new. He was in great demand in Sunday school conventions all over the United States and in Canada to set forth his methods. The book embodies these methods, and will help any superintendent to make a better Sunday school. Published by Fleming H. Revell, New York. $1.25.

—ANOTHER BOOK THAT might be called a companion to Mr. Lawrance's book is Sunday School Problems, by Professor Amos R. Wells. Teachers as well as superintendents will find it profitable to read and study both of these books for two reasons. First, because teachers should be conversant with every phase of Sunday school work in order to be the best teachers they can be. Second, because their knowledge of the work will raise the standard of the superintendent. This book is published by W. A. Wilde Co., Boston. $1.00.

Inquiries about books is particularly gratifying to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday school editor because it indicates an increasing appreciation of the technical side of Sunday school work. The more one knows about it, the more he wants to know; and as general intelligence on the subject is thus increased, loving interest of those who teach is increased, and the whole Sunday school movement is regarded with more favor by those who are not personally connected with it. In this connection it would be well to state that there is a "prayer cycle" for Sunday school workers, so that the Sunday schools in every part of the world are regularly brought to the throne of grace. It is as follows, from May 16 to 31: May 16, Central Africa; May 17, Central America; May 19, South Africa; May 20, Connecticut; May 21, Australia; May 22, Idaho; May 23, New Zealand; May 24, Missionary Education Movement; May 26, Alaska; May 27, Dutch East Indies; May 28, Layman's Missionary Movement; May 29, Wisconsin; May 30, United States of America.

—"FOR MANY YEARS, while superintendent of Sabbath schools, I had difficulty in securing teachers who would properly teach with one purpose in view, that of saving souls, rather than to lecture to their classes."—S. D. Fitchie, Nebraska.

Teachers who do not have in view the saving of the souls of their scholars as the matter of first importance have certainly no right to be in the Sunday school. The superintendent should adhere to that standard even though he can secure only a few teachers on that basis. It will be better to have the classes larger and fewer if need be until teachers of spiritual purpose can be developed. Conversion and leading a Christian life should be open subjects in a class, and then there will be no embarrassment when the teacher reminds first one scholar and then another of his or her duty, on the contrary, those who are Christians will become desirous of helping their classmates to be Christians. Let the standard of excellence be: "Our whole class students of the Bible, members of the church, workers in the church." Boys and girls certainly as young as twelve years of age should have such a standard placed before them. A teacher who simply lectures the Sunday school class has entirely a wrong conception of the relation of teacher and pupil, and has not yet grasped the truth that the formation of character in a greater work than gaining information.

"I s'pose everythin' serves useful pupposes," said Mrs. Palmer.

"Even a Bound Boy. Marm," said John, between his sips, "marm, if Steve Snow had ben a Bound Boy, do you s'pose Clary'd 'a' took up 'ith him?"

"How you talk! How could Steve Snow been bound out?"

"Ef his folks'd lef him, same as mine."

"But they didn't."

"To be sure. You wouldn't guess—would ye now, marm—I useter think 'twas suthin' dretfle to be a Bound Boy."

"Why, John!"

"Yes, the fellers to the scule useter make me feel—'tain't no matter. Mis' Graham, she see how 'twas, an' she tole me there warn't another Bound Boy in town, an' 'twas good to be one w'en all the house here set by me so. And I ben glad ever sence."

"That's right; we do set by ye; you ben han's to me and eyes to Annie."

They were silent a little while; now and then a spurt of flame rose and fell and made the succeeding shadow a shield under which confidences take life. "You've growed into a fine person, John," said Mrs. Palmer, as if with some effort.

"Have I, marm?" said John. "Love done it," he added presently. "You mind once w'en I whistled a wild wood-pigeon to my hand, and I could 'a' kept it, 'ith a pinch o' my thumb an' finger? And I hated to do it, but 'twould 'a' ben a good bite for you an' her. And she considered what I was a-thinkin' of, an' ses, ses she, 'You can't betray its confidence John,' and I let it go. I looked at her, and she looked—I tell ye how she looked—as ef the gate of heaven was open an' the light a-shinin' full in her face."

"What do you know about the gate of heaven, John?" rather wonderingly.

"Jes' what she's tole me. I s'pose she's hed trouble, losing her sight and all, but—"

"Trouble! I should think so! Fum the day she merried Robin Graham. But then nobuddy could 'a' helped merryin' Robin Graham ef he said so. There, the coal's a-graying. Now you go to bed, and you sleep between the blankets."

Whether it was the sage-tea or the blankets or the elasticity of youth and strength, or the absence of dust, John was all right the next morning. Or perhaps it was a dream he had, just before he waked, that put fresh life into him. For Mis' Graham seemed to come to his side, white and lovely as a lily. He was not sure that those were not great snowy pointed wings reaching behind and above her head. She laid her hand on his forehead and said, "I can look into your heart, John. It is a pure heart. The pure in heart see God." Long after daybreak he felt the touch of that soft cool hand on his forehead, when he was out beginning to cut down a tree to be dried for the winter's fire. After all, what was any girl beside this perfect being who lived half in heaven, and took one into heaven with her?

The sun shone; and customers and loungers took up much time at the store, and by twilight of the second day, if John was not the least in the world cast down, any one else would have been. He had, in intervals of making small sales, largely cleaned up the regions below, finding nothing, and now again he was up aloft, dislodging, shaking, blowing, dusting and wiping. "You act as if you was expecting to find a fortune up there," said Mr. Snow, amused at John's earnestness and persistence.

"I be," said John. But he drew a long sigh. It was all right for Mis' Graham if he never came across what he sought; but he wanted to confound Erle Snow with it. Perhaps he was pursuing a chimæra, although he had never heard of such a thing; but his idea was that the wind of opening and shutting the door might have blown that bill in between the folds of a newspaper that had presently been bundled up there with the rest, or it could have dropped into one of the boxes underneath the counter, or—he remembered that old Stephen Snow had a young crow whose tongue had been slit and which said a word or two, and all the world knew that tame crows were thieves.

He was still rummaging, as purchasers came and went, as the fourth day drew towards twilight, when suddenly his hand arrested itself. "Hi!" he called a moment afterwards. "Hi! What's this! I vum, here's an old rusted mousetrap full of little bones!"

"By king!" cried Erle Snow. "You don't say! Why, man above! I set that mousetrap more'n twenty years ago and forgot it till this minute! You don't say!"

home have not done all they could to keep him right. And the whole community is partly to blame for allowing places of temptation to open on every side. To send him to jail for a first offense would usually make matters worse every way. The boy would lose his self-respect and learn new crimes from jail companions. And so in some large cities they set apart some judge, who, like Judge Ben Lindsey, "the kids' judge" of Denver, understands boys, and he paroles them for first offenses; that is, he suspends sentence and sends them home in care of a brotherly probation officer, who visits the boy often at his home or shop or school and seeks to help him to "make good" his promise to be good. And besides this paid probation officer, there are in some of these juvenile courts men who volunteer to be each a "big brother" to some boy criminal. And women agree in like manner to be big sisters for girls gone wrong. Sometimes a men's class in a Sunday school agrees to furnish "big brothers" for the little criminals of a juvenile court. That is a part of what we may call the new chivalry of men's work for boys. The volunteer "big brother" helps the boy who is on probation to be good by going with him on "hikes," by visiting him in his home and showing the parents how they can do more than they have done to guide their boy, and by removing some of the street temptations of the boy, to "make it harder to do wrong and easier to do right," which Edmund Burke said is the purpose of law. "Big brothers" should use law and law enforcement not only to save boys who have already committed some crime, but better still to keep boys from beginning to be criminals.

That is the third kind of big brother, the one who tries to keep boys from ever getting into court. It is said that one of the most esteemed pastors of Hartford, Conn., calls on every new boy that moves into the ward in which he lives, regardless of his denominational relations, to make the boy feel that the preacher who lives near him is a true neighbor and his "big brother," to whom he can come for help and sympathy at any time of need. They say that never from that ward since this "big brother" lived there has any boy been taken to the juvenile court or any other court.

There are many orphan boys who need some "big brother" to take the place of the father or mother they have lost by death. And many others are worse than orphans because they "have no parents to speak of."

"And what is this!" cried John, his voice ringing with triumph. And in a breathless haste he clambered down that ladder, grasping a small pasteboard box that had no cover, and in one corner—what was this in one corner of it?

"See this!" he called out in his rejoicing tones, like the blare of a trumpet. "Look here, sir!" And the master looked. Tucked into one corner was a nest, possibly the nest of the very creatures whose little bones lay in the trap, a nest complete of rags and scraps, and lined with paper scratched and torn and nibbled and worked into place, and the whole thick with gray dust. But under all the dust there it was! "Look here, look here, sir!" cried John again, and Erle Snow bent, and his eyes were starting from his head, and his face was deadly white, and his forehead wet; for there, bitten and crumpled and ragged and soiled, were the fragments of a bank bill that barely held together as with shaking fingers he took it out. But plain as day was the color and number of a ten-dollar bill with the bold bad script of old Stephen Snow across the back of it.

There had been a shower, but if it had rained rivers it would not have stopped the man who was running bare-headed down the road and up the long hill. "What's the matter with Snow?" called one. "What possesses Erle?" called another. But he neither heard nor heeded. His youth had come back to him; all the years between were ashes. He burst open the door of the little hill-top house, and was inside the low dark room he knew of old, where Annie now seemed to shine like a light, and had flung himself on his knees before her, and had buried his head in her lap, throwing his arms up to her shoulders. "Oh, Annie! Annie! Annie!" he called poignantly.

She drew herself back a little, away from the grasp on her shoulders. But when he fell to violent weeping she laid a hand on his head, hesitatingly, lightly. "What I have done to you! Oh, Annie, my Annie, if you will forget it all," he sobbed, "I will make the rest of your life paradise! I will take you to the great doctors who shall give you back the sight of them dear eyes!" And he took her face between his hands as he lifted his head farther and looked into the depths of those eyes magnified through his tears.

"Salt and bitter tears washed the sight from those eyes," sighed Annie. "They washed out of my heart, too, love for the man that could think I was—"

"Don't say it! Don't say it!" he cried in an agony. "I who worshiped you to hurt you so! Oh, it is the same voice," he said, "like the wind in the reeds! Don't let it say harsh things!"

"There is nothing else to say. No, no, Erle."

"My heart is broke!" he cried, still kneeling there.

"You broke mine first," she said, her tone dull and dreary.

"Oh, I know it! I know it! But I, also, I was crucified. You have never been out of my thoughts one day—"

"When you put another woman in my place!"

"That was trying to forget. I remembered all the more. Come to me, Annie! Forgive me! Let me make up for it all. We've lost so much, life is so short, let's think the best is yet to come! And we will make the boy and girl happy, too." And suddenly he took her in his arms, holding her close, and covered her forehead, her eyes, her cheeks, her lips, with kisses. "I deserve nothing. But I will make you forget everything!" he said.

A half hour afterward John, who would not leave the store unguarded till Steve came in, quickly opened the door. "We've found it!" he was crying joyously, not thinking that no one knew what he meant. And then he stopped aghast as he saw Erle Snow beside Mis' Graham with her head on his shoulder. "Marm!" he exclaimed. In an instant, a twinkling, John's world turned upside down, and the light went out. After all, the idol had feet of clay. But it had been his idol. It could never be less.

"John," said Annie, rising, and moving towards him, she smiling, blushing, all but seeing, "when people are being married, their nearest and dearest give them away. When I am married to Erle, John, will you give me away?"

"If it's goin' to make you happy, Mis' Graham, I'd give my soul away!" he said.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE NATIONAL BIBLE INSTITUTE is continuing its open-air evangelistic work this summer, the hope being to hold at least 2,000 such meetings during the season. It is estimated that the number of hearers reached is at least 50,000 per month.

—DR. WILBERT W. WHITE is conducting "Everybody's Bible Class" at the Marble Collegiate Church, Fifth Avenue and Twenty-ninth Street, New York, every Sunday from 4.30 to 5.30 P.M. The inclusive subject is "A Study of the Gospel of John in the Light of Testimony and Belief."

—THE REV. W. H. TILLEY, pastor of the Methodist Church at Centerdale, R. I., a life-long worker in the cause of Prohibition and for many years a subscriber and constant reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, died of pneumonia February 28, in his seventieth year. He left three children, one of whom, Mrs. Mary Collins, 12 Armington Avenue, Providence, R. I., intends to carry on, under the name of the Tilley Memorial Tract Society, an enterprise which her father conducted for many years.

—THE "OLD FIRST" PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH of Glens Falls, N. Y., has a notable record of Christian activities. Its Men's Bible Class numbers over 100, its Women's Missionary Society 150, and it has a large Men's Club, which deals with civic affairs and looks after the unemployed. Rev. L. S. B. Hadley, associate pastor of the church, has decided to join the missionary forces in China.

—THE DEPARTURE OF Dr. Charles T. Sibley from Davao, Philippine Islands, caused much regret to the citizens of that town, one of whom describes him as "our best friend and brother in Christ." He gave a despedida before leaving, the function including a lunch, several games and many speeches from friends, and a "jokeful" one by himself. Dr. Sibley has evidently met with success in his ministry both to the bodies and the souls of the people of Davao, who hope against hope that he will return—some day.

—CYRUS S. TOLMAN, the oldest descendant of the Fitch family, for which Fitchburg, Mass., was named, passed away at his home in that city March 12, 1913, at the age of ninety-four years. In the death of Mr. Tolman, Fitchburg loses one of its oldest citizens, one who was most respected and loved. Mr. Tolman was a successful inventor and manufacturer. He was one of the charter members of the Rollstone Congregational Church Society, which was organized in 1868, and he was closely connected with it and active in all its work to the end of his life. He was its senior member and oldest deacon.

—THE LEPERS of Bethesda Home in Dutch Guiana appeal to us for aid in their distress. They need special help for the many patients in the home who are still sound in body though afflicted with the dread disease. The Bethesda Leper Home is not a hospital, but a home for the unfortunates. It is non-sectarian, and is supported by voluntary contributions. The purpose of the home is to make the afflicted people there as comfortable as possible, and to give them an object in life by assisting them to learn such tasks and occupations as are in their power to perform. At present the Bethesda Home Colony consists of fourteen cottages with accommodation for forty-three patients. Additional cottages are much needed. One thousand dollars will build, completely furnish and equip a cottage for occupancy. In her letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Miss A. E. Scott, secretary of the Bethesda Home, adds: "We appeal to men and women who are living with their children in happy homes, to help these poor outcasts, obliged to be separated from those they love and who must endure such dreadful suffering besides."

WHAT THE GIRLS ARE DOING

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

DON'T you want to know what my pen-and-ink friends say when they write to me, and where they live, and what they are doing? Of course you want to know, so I am going to take a large stack of letters from my desk, and pull out (just as little Jack Horner pulled the plums from his Christmas pudding) some of the messages that have come to me from loving hearts. To be sure there are letters that might interest you much more, and there are stories that might make you sad and sympathetic; but the writers have said: "Please don't put this in the paper," or "Personal," or "This is just between us two," and so, even though you would like to peep into the envelopes, I won't let you, for I will not break my trust!

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

The first letter that I am going to let you see is from a dear little girl in Mexico. We have become, I think, very true friends through our letters, and I hope she will not feel offended when she sees her message in print. She writes:

"There is a lady who thought you knew me personally, from the kind, vivid style you use with me. I cannot find words in your own language to explain to you my admiration."

Far-away little friend, I have shown your letter only in love, and I know that you do not mind!

This is from a dear Virginia girl. Her home is in a heavenly place by the sea, and she loves it, as you may understand from her letter:

"I wish that you could see the bay now, as I see it. It is so beautiful this afternoon, for it is windy and the water is dotted over with foam-capped waves, each rushing to give place to the next. Nature is a mighty good teacher!"

Now, we are going to climb into our aeroplane and whirl away over the country. We shall cross the mountains that guard our East and we shall see the Mississippi River become only a narrow baby ribbon in the distance. Then with a whir of machinery we will stop—in among the Rockies.

A girl from Colorado—my "Girl of the Golden West," I call her—writes:

"We have a mountain ranch, and an old-fashioned log cabin with a fireplace. It is nice and cozy toasting marshmallows and popping corn on cold dreary evenings. And there are times when I ride alone, when it is just twilight and the sky is meeting the old world all around you; when the flush of the dead sun has faded to shell pink and amber, and a thin vale of amethyst hangs over the mountains."

Doesn't that description fit a fairy-tale?

Here is a lady that perhaps we can help. Who knows? She tells us bravely:

"I do different kinds of fancy work, cut work, and crocheting. I can make the counterpanes of crochet and linen combined. A friend of mine sold one for me in the city. Perhaps by this time you understand why I am writing to you. It is to ask you if you can tell me of any one who would care to buy my work."

If you want to buy anything in this line, dear CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, I have plenty of pen-and-ink friends who will help you out.

This note is from one of my other girls. She tells of the way she helps others:

"I write regular letters to two girls who are missionaries. My friends used to say to me, 'How do you write to strangers?' but I told them I wrote exactly the kind of letters that I sent to my dearest friends."

Can you imagine how glad the two girls are to receive such sweet letters from the homeland?

This is from a lonely girl in the Middle West. She has many trials and yet she is playing the "glad game":

"I seldom see any one, and there are no trees, flowers or creeks here; but God made these rolling hills and the soft blue sky, and after all I feel that I have no cause to be sad."

I admire your brave spirit, little friend from out of the unknown!

This poem comes from one who signs herself "Your sincere friend, A Southern Girl":

Hundreds of miles across the way,
This little letter comes to you;
Bearing my heartiest greetings
With thoughts from a friend so true!

Thank you, little stranger girl. (Since you did not send me your name. I must acknowledge your kindness in this way.)

Here is an extract from a message that I like very much:

"I, too, am sometimes troubled by the 'blue imps,' but I have an excellent remedy, better even than biting a bedpost, I think! Whatever I feel like doing when I have the blues coming on, I do just the opposite thing. When I want to cry I laugh, and when I want to say a cross word I say a kind one. The 'blue imps' cannot stand such treatment very long."

Indeed they cannot, and I admire you for your pluck.

Here is a letter from a girl who works, and who, happily, loves her chosen task:

"I am teaching in my own home town, and I enjoy the work very much, notwithstanding the little unpleasant things that arise."

Last of all I am going to show you a note from a straightforward girl, who writes a really good letter:

"I am trying to play 'the game' too. This morning I churned and churned and churned, and the butter would not come. Just as my patience was almost exhausted, and my temper-pot was beginning to simmer, with symptoms of boiling, I thought of 'the game' and decided that I could be very glad indeed that I would not have to churn to-morrow. Pleasant thoughts soon filled my mind, so that, really, when the task was finished I had not given way to complaining and bitter feelings. The game makes one stronger and better, I think."

Some of my friends, I imagine, are either too busy or too shy to write letters to new acquaintances. If they do care to write I shall be waiting with open arms to welcome them, and if they are ever in trouble I may be a help, for that, after all, is the true meaning of the word "friend."

"BE A SUNBEAM"

Can't you whistle just a bit,
Ladilie, as you go?
Brighten up some weary heart
That is aching so?
Can't you sing a bit of song,
Maiden, as you pass along?
Can't you smile
Once in a while
Though things do go wrong?

Can't you spend a little time
Making others happy?
Or are you one of the kind
Always cross and snappy?
If you are I'd like to say,
Better turn around to-day.
Give a trial,
Hurry, smile
Bigger, bromler, that's the way.

Listen, lads and lassies, too,
('Twill not take much time),
What would this old dark world do
Without God's sunshine?
Can't we be his sunbeams, too?
Scatter brightness this world through.
Laugh and try,
'Steal of cry.
Have our motto this, "Be True."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

TESTIMONIES continue to come bearing witness to the present power of the Great Physician to heal from physical sickness. "I wish to make known," writes M. S. from Alton, Kan., "that God has heard and answered my prayers for my dear mother who was very sick. I asked the Lord to give her health and strength, and he did so." Mrs. D. J. S. writes: "I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering prayer by restoring my grandson to health and family." Mrs. E. W. writes from Anderson, Texas: "With a grateful heart I wish to acknowledge answered prayer for the safety of a dear child who has just undergone a painful operation. He does answer prayer, as has been proved to me many times." Mrs. M. F. D., of Kernco, Calif., writes: "I want to acknowledge my thanks to the Lord for restoring my dear daughter to health." Mrs. A. K., of Peoria, Ill., writes: "I wish to acknowledge God's love to me in answer to my prayer in restoring my son-in-law to health after three doctors had given him up to die."

"I am nearing my eighty-third birthday," writes Mrs. J. P. T., of Plateau City, Colo., "but I remember well the first prayer answered for myself and a younger sister. I was eleven and she nine. We went into the woods one Sabbath morning and got lost so completely that we wandered most of the day as fast as our little feet could step, hour after hour, until the sun was getting low in the west. I saw it was useless for us to try to find our way out. I said to my sister: 'No one but God can get us out of this. We did wrong in coming; I wish we had not come. But let us ask him to forgive us and direct us out of this forest.' We knelt right there and asked these favors. In a very short time we started right on as if some one led us, and in a very short time came to an open field, reached a road, came to a house where the people put us on the right road home. Many, many times have I had my prayers answered so quickly I had no fear of failure. I have all along the pathway of life cried unto the Lord, and never in vain."

An "Old Subscriber" writes from Santa Monica, Calif.: "I wish to thank God for watching over me in answer to prayer while I was in the hospital undergoing two operations."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayers have also been received from:

THE AUTO IN THE COUNTRY

NINETEEN THIRTEEN is proving to be the record year for automobiles in small towns and on the farms throughout the country. In 1912 the production of autos was enormous, but this season has seen the output doubled. In 1912 the output was between 250,000 and 285,000 cars. Figures from the various factories place the output for 1913 at 564,000 pleasure cars and 50,000 commercial cars, and these figures do not include electric or steam vehicles, which would probably bring the total up to 20,000 more. There are at the present time 177 manufacturers of autos, 31 being of the larger order, producing cars by the thousand annually. Among the proposed output for 1913 the biggest are the Ford with 200,000, as against 75,000 last year; Studebaker, 50,000; Overland, 40,000; Buick, 25,000; Cadillac, 15,000; Hupp, 15,000; Oakland, 13,000, and over twenty others ranging from 10,000 to 3,000 each. The year's output will aggregate in value over $600,000,000. This enormous increase is directly attributable to the general prosperity of the country, which is largely due to the farmer.

There are 5,422,892 white farmers in the United States (according to the government estimate), only a small proportion of whom own autos to-day; but there are thousands who, having shared in the general prosperity, are now looking forward to being the proud owners of automobiles. And why shouldn't they?

After all, it must be admitted that to very many farmers and their wives, one of the chief arguments in favor of the auto, next to its obvious utility, is that it keeps the boys at home. There are tens of thousands of farmers and village dwellers scattered over the country, who would have made almost any sacrifice to have their sons by them and to feel sure that they would stick to the farm or the store after they themselves were gone. The lure of the city has lost its potency in the family in which an auto is kept. There has been no attraction like it for keeping the young people at home, as it enables them to really know their friends, enjoy a vastly widened range of social amusements and come to feel at home in town. They are no longer isolated; their calling list can be as large as they wish, and they can enjoy the diversions and pleasures to which every young man and woman looks forward eagerly, and from which they were practically barred.

It is on the social side that the country household looks at the auto with special favor. To them it means emancipation from lives of isolation. Nothing is thought of a twenty or twenty-five-mile run to visit a neighbor, and social calls have become quite the fashion in rural districts where they were as rare as angels' visits before. It is no unusual sight to see a farmer with a full load of his folks and possibly an invited guest or two, put out after supper to the nearest town to a concert or some other social attraction and all returning in good spirits in the moonlight. Even on pitch-dark nights there is no plodding along, feeling the road; the bright headlights on the swift machine send a shaft of light along the road, enabling the car to reel off the miles at a merry clip, making the ride home a real pleasure.

Speaking with a New Jersey farmer on the subject of the comparative economy of the automobile and the horse-drawn vehicle, he said: "It does more than twice the work of any team I have and it's such a saving of time and labor. Even if it cost me more than the use of horses, it would be worth the difference, but it doesn't. A good team of horses and a rig will cost us much as a car. My machine cost me $750, and does more farm work than three ordinary rigs. It takes the milk to the creamery before breakfast, carries the most of my produce to the cars, carries me and my folks to town for shopping and in bad weather it takes the children to school. We use it for visiting quite a little too, and for going to church on Sunday. Looks like a lot of work for one little rig, doesn't it? If two teams tried to do the work that little car does, they wouldn't be worth much at the end of a season."

"One great advantage in my case," said a New York truck farmer who owns a gasoline truck, "is that I can take my stuff to a good market in a big manufacturing town eighteen miles off, over good roads, without putting it on the railroad at all, and deliver it fresh and early. There are lots of folks around here who drive to market in the old way; but they have to be up all night to do it, and I get my good night's sleep and am back and at work long before they are. Any one who has used a machine like this knows the advantage it gives him over his neighbors who drive to market with horses. I can put in a few gallons of gasoline, start the engine and be out of sight before the other fellow gets his load out of the yard."

"It's the care that counts in keeping an auto," explained a village motor-car owner. "Any car can be knocked to pieces in a very short time if you're that sort of a man, but good horse sense and sane driving and a little attention will keep a machine looking good and running well. The fellow who buys his gasoline by the barrel and does his own adjusting and cleaning, has little or no expense bills for upkeep. These things the city man usually leaves to the garage keeper, pays the bills and tells his friends what an expensive luxury the automobile is."

There are many good touring cars and runabouts fitted with removable tops and seats, making the body available for carrying loads of a thousand pounds or less. Cars of this type cost from four hundred and odd dollars for the small ones up to a thousand dollars, and for general utility as village and small town cars, they cannot be beaten. For those who want cars for very heavy work, there are the big commercial trucks, costing any way from $1,000 to $5,000.

It is a noticeable fact that the low and medium-priced cars have far outnumbered the high-priced cars, showing that the auto is no longer simply a luxury for the rich, but fills the everyday need of the man of moderate means. In the inexpensive as well as in the costly cars, one rarely runs across the poor construction and unsuccessful experiments which were very often the case several years ago. Manufacturers have spent vast fortunes in perfecting their cars and are giving to the public the best that the American mechanic can produce, and at prices that cannot be equaled by their competitors in other lands.

Farmers as a rule make better automobilists than city or town people, because they have had more experience with machinery. The small stationary farm engine now so generally used has been one of the best educators in this line. In general principles, it is identical with the auto engine, and the man who understands his little one-cylinder general utility engine has little difficulty in managing his auto.

All through the country, thousands of little cars are in use by butchers, grocers, bakers, drummers, agents and salesmen of various kinds. One butcher in a small New Jersey town covers a thirty-mile route every forenoon and is through by one o'clock. Since getting his machine—a twenty-horsepower car with closed delivery body—he has been pleasantly surprised by more than doubling the number of his customers and extending the range and profits of his business. He is only one of many who are doing the same. In a Pennsylvania town, about forty miles below Philadelphia, a baker uses a twenty-two-horsepower machine with closed delivery body, which he packs with bread for delivery over a radius of twenty miles.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Human Fellowship*

A TRUE conception of human fellowship is one of the distinctive notes of Christianity. During the early and middle Christian ages, it was in danger of being lost sight of. It was thought that sainthood required solitude.

But there is nothing like that in the teachings or the example of Jesus. Our Scripture references today show him at the marriage feast, at dinner in the home of a Pharisee, and making the heart of a tax-gatherer glad by going to be his guest. He said of himself that his opponents accused him of being too convivial in his habits. He was willing to take that risk in order that he might impress upon his followers his principles of joyous human fellowship.

There was never a day when this feature of Christ's message had such an opportunity in the world as now. People are seeing more clearly than ever the foolishness and the wickedness of selfishness. Earnest voices, many of them, alas! outside the church, are insisting that society take better care of its workers, its women, its children, that it step forward toward the sane and authoritative demands of altruism. The church of Jesus should be at the very forefront of all this, demonstrating the reasonableness and practicability of Jesus' Gospel of human fellowship.

It is the desire for the realization of this goal that should move us in our work. We must live for others because Christ died for them, because he loves them, because they represent him now. Epworth Leaguers should be jubilant, healthy, vigorous young humans, but in all their work and play they should feel the thrill of that great ideal of our Saviour, the ideal which poor "Bobby" Burns expressed so beautifully, though he failed so sadly of helping its realization in any other way than by his songs:

> It's comin' yet, for a' that,
> That man to man the world o'er
> Shall brithers be—an' a' that.

Industrial Missions†

THE word "work" occurs with great frequency in the New Testament. Jesus was a worker. His call has always been a call for "laborers."

This subject is almost equally interesting as applied both to home missions and foreign missions. The work of the rescue missions in the homeland is to a very large extent the work of rescuing men from lives of idleness. In a larger number of cases than the public is apt to believe the unfortunate men whom the mission seeks to reach are idle through no fault of their own. Industrial conditions are so complex and faulty that multitudes of men who want to work cannot find work to do. But of course there remain the other thousands of those who do not want to work. Such institutions as the Bowery Mission in New York, for instance, couple the business of finding work for their converts with the business of saving and training their souls. The Bowery Mission has made a most remarkable record, having found within the five years just past positions for over eighteen thousand men. It is a striking testimony of the soundness and value of this work that less than five per cent. of these men have failed to make good in the new life of industry.

In foreign lands the work of industrial missions is progressing with gratifying results. The problem is different for each different country. In Africa, for instance, where the native can live quite comfortably with almost no labor at all, it is difficult to get the Christian convert to see the need of going to work. But gradually as he appreciates the benefits of Christian civilization he is willing to learn the trades which are necessary to produce and maintain it. The work of the Livingstonia Industrial Mission is particularly successful. Professor Wilson S. Nayler, in his book, Daybreak in the Dark Continent, says of this mission and those whom it has trained: "Native masons, carpenters, machinists, printers, telegraph operators are transforming the appearance of the recently 'wild' Ngoni into that of a civilized country." The work of this mission is so appreciated by the British Central African Government that a State prize is given to every graduate. The Lovedale Industrial Mission in South Africa had, up to 1900, graduated 1,600 students from a four years' course, besides giving industrial training to many who did not remain to complete the entire course. Of these 1,600 only 15, or less than one per cent., have reverted to heathenism.

In India the work of industrial missions is made more difficult because of the caste system and because of the prejudice against manual labor. This latter difficulty is also felt to some extent in China, where the literary class has developed a contempt for manual labor. But under the new republican government the saner idea of the dignity of labor will be bound to triumph there.

Founding and Developing Baptist Sunday Schools*

JULY 8, 1910, was celebrated in New York City the centenary of the founding of the first Sunday school for the exclusive study of the Bible and other religious exercises. The originator of this idea was the Rev. Archibald Maclay, D.D., an Englishman, who was pastor of the old Mulberry Street (afterward the Tabernacle and now the Second Avenue) Baptist Church. Dr. Maclay had been interested in England in the ragged schools established by Robert Raikes, but he found that there was no call for that kind of Sunday school in New York. He determined, therefore, to start a school which would supplement the teaching of the "civic" schools by direct teaching of the Bible and the singing of Christian hymns. Under his leadership two young members of his Bible training class, Charles G. Sommers and Joseph White Griffiths, opened such a school in a vacant shop in Division Street, the first of its kind in the world.

With this small beginning, the Baptists have gone on "founding and developing" the Sunday school idea with great and ever-growing success. A large number—by far the greater number—of our most prosperous churches, especially in the West, have originated with Sunday schools. Many of these schools have been started as mission schools by the churches, others by independent effort, but the greater number by the colporteurs and missionaries of our denominational societies, the Publication Society and the Home Mission Society, which have special facilities for prosecuting the work. On the foreign fields Sunday schools have been found indispensable agencies in the work of reaching the boys and girls and young people, so that our Baptist Sunday schools are now scattered the world over.

WHITE CARS

Include All of the Improvements Which the Purchaser Should Insist Upon Obtaining in a High-Priced Car

The discriminating purchaser should protect himself against the possibility of his car becoming obsolete in design shortly after his investment.

It is not enough that the car he chooses measures up to the prevailing standards of the day. Undue depreciation is bound to occur unless the car embraces every one of these fundamental features of design:

Long Stroke, Economical Motor—Monobloc Cylinders—
Four Speed, Selective Transmission

To purchase a car that does not have every one of these important features is to purchase a car that is already practically obsolete.

White cars have possessed every one of these up-to-date, practical features for two years. In White Cars the protection of your investment is unquestioned for years to come. The superior value of White Cars is therefore evident.

CLEARED AWAY

Proper Food Put the Troubles Away.

Our own troubles always seem more severe than any others. But when a man is unable to eat even a light breakfast, for years, without severe distress, he has trouble enough.

It is small wonder he likes to tell of food which cleared away the troubles.

"I am glad of the opportunity to tell of the good Grape-Nuts has done for me," writes a N. H. man. "For many years I was unable to eat even a light breakfast without great suffering.

"After eating I would suddenly be seized with an attack of colic and vomiting. This would be followed by headache and misery that would sometimes last a week or more, leaving me so weak I could hardly sit up or walk.

"Since I began to eat Grape-Nuts I have been free from the old troubles. I usually eat Grape-Nuts one or more times a day, taking it at the beginning of the meal. Now I can eat almost anything I want without trouble.

'When I began to use Grape-Nuts I was way under my usual weight, now I weigh 30 pounds more than I ever weighed in my life, and I am glad to speak of the food that has worked the change." Cross Section Diamond Safety Tread Tire with Perfect 3-Point Rim Contact

It's the rim as much as the road that wears out your tires. So we said to our Engineers: "You must build us a tire with perfect 3-point rim contact."

They did—and now we offer you a sane, sensible, No-Clinch tire that will appeal to you, as a hard-headed, shrewd tire-buyer—a man who insists on easy riding comfort and good liberal mileage.

Each point of rim contact in a tire is a point of support. Where the points of contact are not perfect, undue pressure is brought to bear at an unsupported point of the tire.

Then what happens?

The result is a terrific strain on the tire that will cause rim troubles, breaking above the bead and separation of the tread from the carcass.

All this is overcome in the "Diamond" because the three points of rim contact are absolutely mechanically perfect—the annealed steel cabled wire bead holds with a vise-like rim-grip.

This is only one Diamond advantage.

You get additional More Mileage advantage without extra expense in the Diamond Vitalized Rubber—a scientific combination of pure, lusty young rubber and a secret toughening compound—nothing inferior in rubber, fabric or workmanship—the No-Pinch Safety Flap inner tube protector—and, if you desire, the now famous Safety (Squeegee) Tread.

Questions and Answers

F. A. H., Pullman, Wash. 1. One of my Bible class students recently nsked this question: "If Adnm and Eve had no knowledge of good and evil before eating the forbidden fruit, why was it a sin to eat?" 2. Why should such knowledge be wrong?

1. Although Adnm and Eve had no knowledge of good and evil, because there was as yet no evil in the world, they knew that they ought to obey God. It was a sin to eat of this particular tree because he had plainly commanded them not to do so. 2. It is impossible to know what was meant by "the tree of the knowledge of good and evil." It may have been so called simply beenuse the eating of its fruit, nfter it had been forbidden, would bring them that experimeatnl knowledge of sin. Before they slaned they knew only that disobedience was possible; after they had sinned they knew experimeatally what sin was nnd the sad difference between being holy and being sinners. It was not the knowledge but the disobedience that was wrong.

E. A. S., Columbus, Kan. It was immediately after his baptism by John that Jesus was led by the Spirit into the wilderness. He had just received the outward acknowledgment of his mission and authority, and now he was to prepare for the more public work before him by a period of prayer, fasting and deeper spiritual experience and communion with the Father. It was, in effect, a higher consecration, if such were possible. During those forty days "the plan and future of his work must have been always before him." Nowhere in the Scripture are we led to conclude that he had not always been clearly conscious of the outline of his mission, although its comprehensiveness and detail could only become apparent as the work proceeded.

R. D., Galean, Ill. 1. The obvious meaning of the passage in Mark 5: 39 is that so brief had been the damsel's state of death ns to be more like a short sleep than death itself. It was as though He had used the familiar figure "she hath fallen asleep"—the snme figure that is frequently employed in the Scriptures in describing death as sleep. See Acts 7: 60; I Cor. 15: 6, 18; II Peter 3: 4. Some have interpreted the language of Mark 5 to mean that the maid was in a trance or swoon; but most commentators agree that Mark 5: 35 is a clear affirmation that all the signs of death were evident, that the life had already fled and that the reassuring words of the Master (in verse 36) before he had even seen the maid, were intended to strengthen the ruler's faith nnd prepare him for the manifestation of divine power that followed. The last nine verses, rend as n whole, bear out this conclusion. 2. In I Peter 4th chapter, the apostle represented the true attitude of the church in every age, expecting Christ to come at any moment, to judge the "quick and the dend." The verse is parallel to I Peter 3: 19. Some authorities have interpreted this "preaching" as an annunciation of his finished Gospel work. There is no passage in this or nny other part of the Bible which affords the slightest foundation for holding that a second "day of grace" is given in Hades.

W. P. S., Belgrade, Mont. We think you did right in taking the stand you did against cards and dnncing. Even in the mildest aspect they are frivolous and time-wasting; but in very mnny cases they are a source of real evil. For the sake of example if for no other reason, and lest we should be a means of lending others into sin, we should avoid "even the appearance of evil" and let these things alone.

J. L. H., Keota, Iowa. A friend of mine argues that a man who is a good, honest, moral, upright man and a good citizen can enter the kingdom of heaven when he dies the snme as the man with the snme qualities who has named the name of Christ and made a public confession of his faith in Christ. Please state your opinion.

People are constantly being misled in this matter because they fail to understand what salvation really is. Salvation is personal friendship and companionship with God. It is hard to see how a man who is not a friend of God at death will become one immediately after death. Being honest and upright does not really get us acquainted with God. Paul was intensely moral before his conversion, but he found out later that he had been an enemy of God nll the time. Then, too, salvation means humility and meekness. The man who believes he can snve himself puts himself out of the kingdom of heaven by that very attitude of mind. For the kingdom of heaven is made up of people with childlike hearts, who have given up their pride and self-will. Nor will the mere naming of the name of Christ and making a public confession make the necessary change. Jesus said very distinctly: "Ye must be born again." It is extremely unwise and unsafe to quarrel or argue with Jesus. He knows all about the human heart and all about the kingdom of heaven. The only thing to do is to necept his plan of salvation and let him give us the new heart, the heart that is humble and obedient, that is not self-confident but trustful, the heart that loves God and so will feel at home in God's heaven.

Subscriber, Amherst, Mass. The Federation of Churches, while it is an orthodox organization, holding all the essentials of the Christian faith, embraces a wide variety of denominations, the object being to unite them, as far as possible, on common ground, while not interfering with their denominntioaal differences. Such an organization must necessarily be broad.

V. A. S., Elyria, Kan. 1. If God is all-knowing why did he say to Abraham: "For now I know that thou fearest God" (Gen. 22: 12)? Does not this seem to imply that he did not know before? 2. Have the promises of God to Abraham all been fulfilled? 3. Why did Abraham not live in a permanent home, since he was so rich? 4. What is meant by the statement that God made man in his own image? In what way does he resemble Him?

1. This statement may be taken merely as the announcement that Abraham had stood God's test. The old problem of foreknowledge is an extremely difficult one, and discussion about it is usually fruitless. But we know that such an experience as this that Abraham had gone through is like the testing or proving of nny instrument. It demonstrates what it is made of and how strongly and well it is made. God in this case speaks of the test as if it had been his own experiment. He proved Abraham and found him sound. 2. All the promises to Abraham have been fulfilled except the return of his descendants to the promised land. His seed is past all reckoning. Not only have all the Jews been his offspring, but Christians as well are his spiritual children. Their faith in Christ brings them into his family and makes them heirs of the promises made to him. The land of Canaan was promised to his seed forever. Since they are not in possession of it now we must believe they will return, as many other prophecies also declare. 3. Abraham probably preferred the nomadic life. He w accumulating cattle and other possessions d ing his travels. Then, too, he was taking p session by faith of the land through whic traveled. He believed God's promise that would one day belong to his descendants. (S Gen. 13: 15.) 4. Man was made like God the fact of his being a personality, with i tellect, sensibility and will, and possessing moral nature.

E. T., Boone, Iowa. The covenant wi Abraham was, in a spiritual sense, to be everlasting covenant. It applies to the chur in all ages (to "Abraham and his seed," G 3: 29). Circumcision was a sign and symb of spiritual blessing. The covenant, howeve applied only to those who lived up to its r quirements. In the Christian Church, baptis conveys the same significance.

Reader, Greenville, N. Y. Please describe t teachings of the "Holiness" Movemen

From time to time a number of cults hav appeared which held the doctrine of Christia Perfection, but it was not until the time c John Wesley that the doctrine was develope and preached so as to have wide influence. was this doctrine that was the distinctive not of the early work of Methodism. It is still hel and taught by the branches of that denomina tion. It is also held and taught by the Salvatio Army, while other denominations and organiza tions teach doctrines approaching more or les closely the Wesleynn position. The Pentecosta Church of the Nazarene is the latest denomina tional expression of this doctrine; this church has had a phenomenally rapid growth. Aside from these denominational groups there are in Amer ica the National and the Central Southern Holiness Associations. In addition to these direct developments of the Holiness movement there has been, among leaders from other de nominations, a marked approach toward the Wesleyan position. Since the time of Moody many preachers and writers, such as Torrey, McNeil, F. B. Meyer and Robert E. Speer, have taught that the baptism of the Holy Spirit is a second experience, and many influential leaders have taught the possibility of being kept from sin. The point upon which the positive Holiness Movement, including the Methodist Church, the Salvation Army and the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene, differs from the rest is on the question of "eradication," the former holding

AMERICA'S FOURTH NATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS

OVER two hundred delegates from all parts of the United States, from Canada, and several of the South American republics gathered in St. Louis, Mo., for the fourth American Peace Congress. The first four days of May were occupied by series of meetings at which the present status of the peace propaganda and the hopes for the immediate future were reviewed.

The congress was opened with an invocation by Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle and by speeches of welcome from Governor Major of Missouri and Mayor Kiel. Congressman Richard Bartholdt presided at the opening session and made a general defense of the agitation for peace in the face of actual warfare and the increased preparations for war in Europe. He said in the course of his address:

"Certain people delight in reminding us with every new war of the futility of our efforts, but who dares say we are in the wrong or that our efforts will be futile in the end? As a matter of fact, the cause of peace has sufficiently advanced that even to-day every shot fired, every life lost, every drop of blood shed is recognized as a fervent appeal to the human conscience to heed those who urge a more humane method of settling differences between nations. In the agony, the loss, the moral damage, the hell of war, the peace movement finds, not its condemnation, but its complete justification.

"'Meeting under war clouds,' then, proves nothing against us pacifists except that our advice has not yet been sufficiently heeded, but, on the other hand, no one can escape the conclusion that the continued existence of war clouds in an era of armaments is a complete refutation of the arguments of those who are constantly promising us cloudless skies as the result of big armies and big navies. Once convinced of this logic the world is bound to turn from their remedies to ours."

Andrew Carnegie also addressed the first session on "The Baseless Fear of War." During his speech Mr. Carnegie was interrupted by a questioner in the audience who called out, "How about Japan?" The ironmaster replied, "Well, Japan has nineteen battleships and we have thirty-three, and more coming." The questioner admitted this, but said, "Right now we are in mortal terror." Then Mr. Carnegie appealed to the audience, asking every one present who was not afraid of Japan to stand up. As every one stood, he remarked to the questioner, "Nobody is in mortal terror but you."

Mr. Carnegie advanced the idea that he has advocated for some time of an international police force, and added to it the advocacy of a commercial and postal boycott on nations which offend against the world's peace. Later on, in conversation with Mr. Bartholdt and Governor Major, Mr. Carnegie expressed his approval of the Wilson-Bryan program for the investigation of international disputes by a commission. This idea received the formal approval of the congress by its incorporation in the official platform given out by Dr. Benjamin Trueblood. In that document the congress expresses its heartiest approval, stating its belief that such full investigation by an international commission into the facts of any dispute which either of the parties may not consider proper for arbitration will advance the cause of universal peace by allowing national feeling to cool down before any steps are taken toward hostilities.

On the second day of the congress an informal reception was given at the Noonday Club and a committee was there selected by the chairman to draft a cablegram of congratulation to the Chinese republic on its formal recognition by the United States. That morning's session in the Odeon the topic was "Problems of the Hague Conference." The most important idea advanced was that of Professor William I. Hull of Swarthmore College, who said that the next step in the tribunal's development should be that its members should cease to represent particular nations and act for the family of nations.

During the congress speeches on various peace subjects were made by former Vice-President Fairbanks, Laura Drake Gill, Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Booker T. Washington, Rev. Thomas E. Green of Chicago, President David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford University, and Mrs. Percy V. Pennybacker, president of the General Federation of Women's Clubs. Three of the Canadian delegates, John Lewis, editor of the Toronto Star, and Justices Riddell and Russell of the Supreme Courts of Ontario and Nova Scotia, also added to the diversity of the sessions by introducing their ideas of the peace propaganda from the viewpoint of their British citizenship.

At the closing session Señor F. A. Pezet, the Peruvian ambassador, gave an address which attracted a great deal of attention because he fearlessly criticized Americans in general for their lack of knowledge about South America and their attitude toward their Southern neighbors.

"You don't study our history," he said, "though we teach your history to all our children. You overlook our virtues and magnify our faults. You call us lazy and indolent, and your literature sets about deliberately to foster this false impression."

The final report of the congress calls attention to several activities for the future which are of undoubted interest to all who wish to see America

THE GLORIES OF BABYLON

BY EDGAR J. BANKS, PH.D.

BABYLON, the glory of kingdoms, the beauty of the Chaldees' excellency, shall be as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah." No prophecy was ever more accurately fulfilled than were these words of Isaiah. In the year 538 B.C. Babylon fell into the hands of Cyrus, king of Persia. For a time Cyrus made the city his home; later the Parthians lived on its site; then the exiled Hebrews built their homes there, and the Hebrew homes gave way to the filthy huts of the desert Arabs. Finally the greatest city of the ancient Orient fell to ruins and was buried deep beneath the accumulated débris of later ages. Thus Babylon as a city was forgotten; its site became so desolate that no Arab pitched his tent there, so barren that no shepherd grazed his flocks there; only the hoot of a solitary owl hiding in some once pleasant palace, or the child-like wail of the jackal prowling in the darkness of night, broke the stillness. It is only in our day that the excavator has uncovered the ruins of the long-buried city that we may marvel at its wonders as did the travelers of old.

Babylon is one of the few ancient Oriental cities whose site has never been quite forgotten. Travelers of all ages have described its ruins. A few explorers of the past century wandered over the mounds and wondered what they might contain. Arabs from the neighboring town of Hillah dug deep trenches into them in their quest for building bricks, but it has remained for the German excavators, who are now at work, to bring to light the buried temples and palaces and their treasures. During the past twelve years the German Oriental Society, represented by Dr. Robert Koldewey and his able assistants, has been seeking to recover the ancient city. For several years their work met with little success, but at last their efforts have been rewarded.

The ancient authors were fond of describing Babylon, yet their descriptions were so fantastic that men refused to believe them. The wonderful hanging gardens, the huge temples and towers and palaces were thought to be the creation of imaginative minds. Herodotus said that the walls of Babylon were 365 feet high and 85 feet wide; that 250 towers surmounted their summits, and that one hundred gateways with gates of bronze led into the city. One writer says that the walls were forty-two miles in length; another says they were fifty-six. The Germans have not been able to determine the height of the walls, for they have fallen, nor could they trace their entire course, yet as much of the walls and temples and palaces as they have uncovered assures us that the ancient authors did not exaggerate the wonders of the city.

Seventy miles south of Bagdad, on the eastern shore of the Euphrates, within the long low ridges which represent the ancient city walls, the Germans found that Babylon had turned to three large and to several smaller mounds of clay. In the northern part of the city is the tall hill called Babil. A mile to the south is the Kasr or the fortress, a name which the Arabs have given to the mound because massive brick walls have always projected from the summit. Still farther south is Amran, so called because on its summit stands a tomb in which the Arabs say a Moslem saint of that name is buried. To the south are other low mounds, and along the river shore is an embankment of burned bricks, which Nebuchadnezzar built to confine the river to its course. In every direction for miles on the surrounding plain pottery fragments are strewn, showing that once the space within the walls was covered with houses. Such was Babylon when the Germans began to excavate the city; its present appearance is that of a labyrinth of ruined structures.

Babil, the northern mound, still bears the ancient name of the city. It is a huge square hill more than a hundred feet in height, and with sides so steep that they are difficult to climb. It is specially here that the Arabs have dug for bricks, and now as you wander about the summit you may see far down the shafts the massive walls of the great arches, arranged side by side and tier upon tier. Though the hollows of the arches have long been filled with fallen débris, once you might have seen through them. Dr. Koldewey believes that the ruin represents the Tower of Babel, because it still bears the name; more likely the hanging gardens of Babylon were there. Shady trees and hanging vines grew upon the elevated terraces. Water was raised from the Euphrates to the very summit, and came trickling down from terrace to terrace to nourish the vegetation. About the terraces were shady walks, and the long passages beneath the arches were delightfully cool and dark. Their entrances were half concealed by the overhanging vines, and the hot air, tempered by the trickling water, swept through them. Here the king and his queen passed the heat of the Babylonian summer, just as now the resident of Bagdad spends the hot days in his serdaub. In the underground second of the three large mounds, the Kasr, or the fortress, the Germans have done their best work. Here with a constant force of two hundred men, the excavations have been continued winter and summer. The workmen from the neighboring town of Hillah are Arabs whose long experience in digging for antiquities has specially qualified them for excavation work. They are arranged in groups of twelve. The foreman, with a native one-pronged pick, loosens up the dirt. Men with pointed hoes scrape the dirt into the baskets, and other men, with small baskets of date leaves, carry it to a car which is pushed along a narrow iron track to the dump at the edge of the mound. The pay of these men ranges from twelve to twenty cents a day. It is only at Babylon that a railroad has ever been employed in the excavation of an ancient ruin. There is a commissioner who is appointed by the Turkish Government to take charge of all the antiquities, for all the objects found beneath the soil in Turkey belong to the government; the excavators who find them may only photograph them, or copy their inscriptions.

When the excavations at Babylon were begun, Dr. Koldewey built a large house to the west of the Kasr on the bank of the Euphrates. The bricks used in its construction were dug from the ruins, and each bears on its lower face the name and titles of Nebuchadnezzar. Its plan is not unlike a Babylonian home, with its large open court surrounded by chambers, and with a flat roof where the hot nights are spent. Along the ancient embankment, however, the Euphrates no longer flows, for a few miles to the north of the city the river runs away into the western desert, and has left its former bed dry. Water may now be obtained only by digging into the river bed. The people of Hillah, compelled by drought, are migrating elsewhere. Babylon has never been so dry and so desolate as now.

In wandering over the Kasr the first object you will notice is a large granite lion standing over the figure of a prostrate man, reminding you at once of the story of Daniel in the lion's den. The lion was found years ago and was left lying uncared for at the bottom of a shaft, but Dr. Koldewey has placed it on a pedestal of bricks as if to guard the palace as in the ancient times. The sculptor of the lion never completed his work, for the stone is in the rough; the man beneath is merely outlined. It has suffered, too, from the hands of the Arabs, who delight in stoning it as an evil spirit of the past, and they have drilled a small round hole deep into one of its sides in search for gold.

Beyond the lion you stand amazed at the massive brick walls before you. You no longer doubt that Babylon was the wonder city of the ancient world. There is the Ishtar Gate, opening into the sacred street which led from the palace to the temple, and along which the statues of the gods were drawn in procession. The walls still rise forty feet above their foundations; originally they were higher, and they are built entirely of the square burned bricks bearing the name of Nebuchadnezzar. The gateway is flanked with towers twelve feet square, six of them, three on each side, and they are decorated with reliefs of bulls and lions and dragons, in bricks glazed blue and yellow and white. Glazing seems to have first appeared in Babylonia about the time of Nebuchadnezzar, yet the coloring is as fresh as ever it was. Each brick was moulded and glazed separately, yet so accurately was the work done that when the bricks were placed in the wall the relief was perfect. It is only in the Ishtar Gate that such glazed work has been found in Babylonia.

Beyond the gateway is the palace of Nebuchadnezzar. All that is left of one of the most important buildings of the ancient world are the foundations; few of the walls of its hundreds of small chambers stand to the height of more than four feet. The Oriental has never cared for large sleeping chambers; the modern Babylonian tucks himself away to sleep in a small closet safe from the night air. So many of the chambers of Nebuchadnezzar's palace were hardly larger than a modern bed. There was one chamber, however, much larger than the rest, and that, so Dr. Koldewey believes, was the throne room of the great king. Along one edge of it was a low brick platform upon which the throne may have stood.

For a long time the excavators were disappointed in finding little but walls among the ruins. In the upper strata there were Hebrew bowls and Parthian coins and graves in abundance, but in the chambers of Nebuchadnezzar's palace very little more than a few household implements. There was no great library of clay tablets as at Nineveh, nor were the walls lined with sculptured slabs, as were the Assyrian palaces. The chief discovery was a large black monument bearing on one of its sides the figure of a Hittite king; on the other was a long Hittite inscription. The stone had been brought from the Hittite country as a trophy of war. Excavations were carried down beneath the palace with the hope of finding ruins of a greater age. Though Babylon existed 2,500 years before the Christian era, little has appeared among its ruins from before the age of Nebuchadnezzar. About the year 700 B.C. Sinacherib, king of Assyria, destroyed Babylon, and that it might never be rebuilt, and the place where it stood forgotten, he scraped even its foundations into the river. This is the reason why the Germans have discovered little of an earlier age.

The excavations in the mound of Amran illustrate the wonderfully patient work of the Germans. Here, forty feet beneath the surface of the mound, was discovered the famous temple which was one of the wonders of the ancient world. The walls of the temple have disappeared; only its foundations remain, but from them the entire plan of the building is distinct. There were the outer and inner courts, and the innermost shrine or the holy of holies where the image of the great god stood. About the outer court were the chambers for the priests, and secret passageways led to the shrine. Running from the temple into the city was a paved street, the Street of Daniel, as the Germans have called it without any special reason for doing so. Imagine a hole nearly an acre in extent, dug by hand down to the depth of forty feet, and you will understand the labor which the discovery of this temple has cost the Germans. But the reward has been sufficient. Now we know the plan of the greatest temple of Babylon; we can reconstruct the forms of the Babylonian worship, which closely resemble those of the Hebrews; we have learned more of the life of the Jews whom Nebuchadnezzar carried from Jerusalem, and new chapters are added to sacred history. One little barrel-shaped object covered with writing, coming from Cyrus, tells how Babylon fell. Numbers of clay tablets found in the smaller mound of Jumjuma speak of the great banking house of the Igibi or Jacobs family of Jews, which controlled the finances of Babylonia for centuries. The ancient plan of the city has been determined; its walls have been measured; its streets have been traced. Though large parts of the city still lie buried far beneath later ruins, enough of it has been uncovered so that we are no longer dependent upon the imagination of the artist for a picture of it. We have the city itself to tell us how it looked, how its people lived and traded and worshiped, and how the great Nebuchadnezzar ruled. Thus the dead cities of the Bible are no longer dead; the spade of the excavator is restoring them to us.

To Celebrate One Hundred Years of Peace

ON MAY 5 the delegates to the international conference on the program for the centenary celebration of the Treaty of Ghent, which brought to a close the War of 1812 between Great Britain and the United States, held their first session at the Plaza Hotel, New York City. The business was purely formal, no plans having yet been definitely proposed.

In the morning the British, Belgian, Canadian and Australian delegates were escorted to the City Hall by the American members of the conference, and Mayor Gaynor welcomed the visitors and commended their mission as one of the highest educational value to the whole world. He attributed the long peace on the 4,000-mile frontier between the United States and Canada as largely due to the absence of war vessels on the Great Lakes. In his opinion this suggested that powerful influence of disarmament as a promoter of peace. Lord Weardale, the leader of the British delegation, also extolled the absence of warships on the Great Lakes. Mr. Alton B. Parker, chairman of the American committee, Alderman De Bruyne of Ghent, Belgium, and Sir Edmund Walker, C. V. O., the chief of the Canadian delegation, gave short addresses, after which the company was entertained at lunch by the Pilgrims Society.

Mr. Chauncey M. Depew, toastmaster, thought the non-existence of cables and reporters contributed to the success of the negotintions at Ghent. Mayor Gaynor considered that the chief problem as to the continuation of peace came down to individuals; also that the influence of such societies as the Pilgrims, and of men who believed in the things that society stood for, would go far in restraining even a warlike President in Washington and a warlike Prime Minister in London. Sir Edmund Walker, for Canada, laid emphasis on the strong factor making for peace created by the commercial intercourse between this country and his own. As certain American papers had erroneously announced the death of Sir George Houston Reid, Lord High Commissioner for Australia, that gentleman felt it necessary to apologize for appearing in this country after such kindly obituaries had been published.

Among the plans for the celebration of the hundred years of peace about which there has been some unofficial newspaper talk, is the erection of an arch at Rouse's Point, N. Y., near the Canadian frontier, and twenty-four miles from Plattsburg, where the naval battle was fought that practically ended the War of 1812. The British commander in that battle and many of his officers were buried with the American dead, and their graves have always been tended with greatest care.

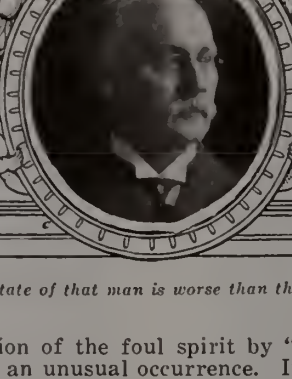
SIN AND THE HEART



A SERMON

Rev. David J. Burrell, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT: "And the last state of that man is worse than the first." Luke 11:24-26

THE Lord has just healed a demoniac; and the multitude, amazed by this and his other wonderful works, were asking, "Is not this the Christ?" The Scribes and Pharisees, alarmed by his increasing popularity but unable to deny the validity of the miracle, charged him with "casting out devils through Beelzebub the prince of devils." His answer was after the manner of the schools. He began with the reductio ad absurdum: "If Satan be divided against himself, how shall his kingdom stand?" He next employed the argumentum ad hominem: "If I by Beelzebub cast out devils, by whom do your sons cast them out?" And then he used the syllogism, "If I with the finger of God cast out devils, there is no doubt that the kingdom of God is come among you." Having thus disposed of his critics by the logical method, with which they were most familiar, he resumed his popular form of address in the parable of the House without a Tenant.

The House Desolate

It is commonly agreed that the immediate application of this parable was to the Jews. The evil spirit which had long held possession of the nation was idolatry, which was finally cast out by the Babylonish captivity. It required seventy years of discipline to clean house; but it was cleaned as with a besom. On their return from Babylon the Jews proceeded to the garnishing. What fasts and festivals and solemn assemblies! Of the outer forms of religion there was no lack, of bowings and genuflections, of formal prayers and oblations and tithes of garden herbs. It was at this time and under such conditions that Isaiah delivered the thrilling message, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth; for the Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children and they have rebelled against me. To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? Bring no more vain oblations; your incense is an abomination unto me. Wash you, make you clean; cease to do evil, learn to do well!" The house had been swept of idolatry and garnished with all manner of rites and ceremonies, but, alas, it was empty! There was no real devotion. The result was a foregone conclusion. Into that empty house came the evil spirits of pride and uncharitableness, formalism and hypocrisy, worldliness, apostasy and disloyalty to the Hope of Israel: so that when the long-looked-for Messiah came, it was his own people who nailed him to the bitter tree! Thus their house was "left unto them desolate"; and it has remained desolate to this day.

But the parable is not exhausted by this application. We frequently lose the value of truth by carrying umbrellas to shed its droppings on other people. The Jews have much to answer for; but in this case there are important lessons for us.

Casting Out the Squatter

The parable is addressed in particular to respectable sinners. The general understanding is that there are two kinds of sinners: namely, the vulgar sort of "down and out" drunkards and reprobates who frequent our rescue missions, and the respectable class that assembles in our Fifth Avenue churches. In fact, however, there is no such distinction in the sight of God.

The house of this parable is the heart of man, "out of which are the issues of life." Its owner is God, who, as its Creator and Redeemer, has a proprietary right in it. But he is excluded. "The carnal mind is enmity against him."

The intruder is Satan, who occupies the heart only by "squatter's right." There he is, however; and "possession is nine points of the law." The denial of the personality of Satan, against the teaching of Christ and the Scriptures, is one phase of current unbelief. If the foundations of Biblical authority are undermined what is to prevent the gainsaying of any or all spiritual truth? In that case the rejection of the incarnation and the atonement, of the divine immanence and the supernatural itself follows almost as a matter of course. But however men may argue against the personality of Satan they inadvertently consent to it when, on seeing a man given to nameless vices, they say, "The devil is in him."

The eviction of the foul spirit by "the stronger man" is not an unusual occurrence. In the experience of many a drunkard there comes a time when, scourged by shame and remorse, he cries, "Things cannot go on this way," and resolves to be a better man. I do not go with those who regard this as impossible even in the most desperate cases. A man can quit his vicious habits when he wants to.

The will is here the "stronger man." The drunkard "swears off"; and this particular spirit of evil goes out of him. He has "reformed," as we say; and it is assumed that he is a better man.

The sweeping and garnishing are then in order. The man is now clothed and apparently in his right mind. He takes his place in commercial life where he is recognized as a man among men. He appears at social functions in evening dress and conforms to all the external proprieties. He is to all appearances a respectable man. The vulgar vices, such as theft and adultery and inebriety, are abhorrent to him. He keeps out of jail, as a good citizen, and conforms to the conventions of common life. But the question occurs, is he really a better man?

The house is empty. It is swept and garnished, but without a tenant. He has not passed under the yoke of any nobler purpose or lofty aim. The owner of the house is still shut out. It is to let. An empty house is a weird place; full of gloom and shadows and oppressive silence, of ill odors and scurrying mice and of mold and cobwebs. An empty heart-house is always a haunted house; haunted by ghosts of previous occupants; by memories of the mislived past.

The Keeper of the House

What happens then? Here they come! The seven spirits of evil are not content to "wander in dry places," but must needs find an embodiment in man. The vacant heart invites them. No vulgar vices now; but smug and decorous sins, such as pride, envy, avarice, impiety, insincerity and self-righteousness. Oh, there is no end of respectable sins!

Here is your Pharisee, standing and praying thus with himself, "God, I thank thee that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican." He looks askance at the publican who stands afar off, beating on his breast and saying, "God, be merciful to me!" Yet this vulgar sinner went down to his house justified rather than his respectable neighbor. The garnishing of fringes and phylacteries covers no sins from God. He sees the dead men's bones in the whited sepulcher. The secret imaginations of the heart are known to him. And sin is always sin in his eyes; vulgar or respectable, it matters not. Envy and avarice and selfish arrogance are as truly abhorrent to him as theft and murder and adultery. It follows that the man who has forsworn inebriety or licentiousness or any other of the vulgar vices, while yielding to more presentable sins, is mistaken in assuming that, on that account, he is really a better man. In fact, "the last state of that man is worse than the first"; since, by reason of self-satisfaction, he is less accessible to the approach of truth and righteousness.

What is the remedy? Let the Owner come in! He wants to be admitted, saying, "My son, give me thy heart!" Once there, he has power to repel all comers. Without him there is no moral security; for "except the Lord keep the house, the watchman waketh but in vain." All the good resolutions in the world cannot exclude sin from a heart that is closed against God.

Faith the Dynamic of Conduct

One of the best sermons ever preached was that of Dr. Bushnell on the "Expulsive Power of a New Affection." The effort to rid one's self of besetting sins by the mere power of resolution is as irrational as it would be to undertake to exhaust the foul air in a room by the use of an air-pump. Open the doors and windows, and the thing is done! Thus the love of God drives out the love of sin.

And with the new affection comes a new conviction. Life is now grounded in truth. Faith becomes the dynamic of conduct. Things temporal and things spiritual are seen in their right relations. The man has a goal set before him, and "the high calling of God in Christ Jesus" rings in his ears. He is no longer under the necessity of casting up earthworks to repel every invader, because God has taken command; and if God be for him, who can be against him? His heart is fixed on the great verities which center in God and is therefore armed and equipped against sin.

And the new affection and the new conviction bring with them a new occupation. The man has something to do. He has found a new Master and keeps busy for him. To the spirits of evil who draw near, as Sanballat and Tobiah approached the builders on the walls of Jerusalem, he answers, "I am doing a great work, and I cannot come down!"

It is frequently said that if one does his best no more can be required of him. This is quite true; but no man is doing his best when he leaves God out of the reckoning.

"Try Christ. Let Him In"

It would be difficult to find a more pathetic confession of failure than that of Charles Lamb: "The waters have gone over me. But out of the black depths, could I be heard, I would cry out to all those who have set foot in the perilous flood. Could the youth to whom the flavor of the first wine is delicious as the opening scenes of life, or the entering of some newly discovered paradise, look into my desolation and be made to understand what a dreary thing it is when he shall feel himself going down a precipice with open eyes and a passive will; to see his destruction and have no power to stop it; to see all godliness emptied out of him and yet not be able to forget a time when it was otherwise; to bear about the piteous spectacle of his own ruin; could he see my fevered eye, fevered with the last night's drinking and feverishly looking for to-night's repetition of the folly; could he but feel the body of the death out of which I cry hourly with feebler outcry to be delivered—it were enough to make him dash the sparkling beverage to the earth in all the pride of its mantling temptation." Poor Charles Lamb! Had he been as willing to lean on God as he was to confess his own weakness he would never have written, "I had no power to stop it!"

The effort to repel sin and build up character without the divine help is a dead lift; and it always ends in failure. The best that can be hoped for under such circumstances is the transformation of a vulgar into a respectable sinner, which does not mean the making of a better man. No such halfway measures will answer. Take the case of John B. Gough as a contrast to that just referred to. For years he tried to reform himself, only to find that the expulsion of one vicious habit was merely the opening of the door for other sins. One day as he was reeling through the street of Newburyport a cobbler named Joel Stratton laid a kind hand on his shoulder and said, "John, there's good stuff in you; but you are going at this thing in the wrong way. I know a Friend who can help you. Try Christ. Let him in!" From that day the result was certain. He had a mighty Friend and leaned hard on him. His resolutions now were buttressed by Omnipotence. The Owner of his heart was defending it.

"Behold, I Stand at the Door"

The life of Luther is also in evidence. He was compassed about by besetting sins. He speaks of his many personal encounters with the spirits of evil. It was "hard pounding, gentlemen," as Wellington said of Waterloo, and with little to show for it. But the time came when Luther, half way up Sancta Scala, heard a voice saying, "The just shall live by faith!" And then and there he took Christ as the Man of his counsel. The rest of his life's voyage was all plain sailing. He presently wrote: "If any man knock at my bosom and ask 'Who dwells here? Luther?' my reply is 'Nay; Luther once dwelt here, a self-willed man; but Christ has moved in and taken possession.' I no longer live, but Christ liveth in me!"

Are you, my friend, engaged in this grapple with sin? Have you failed? Are you asking, like the young ruler, "What lack I yet?" You need a Tenant. Let the Lord come in! He waits to enter. His word is full of promise: "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man will open unto me I will come in and sup with him and he with me."

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, May 25. I John 2: 1-11. A new commandment! And yet it is an old one with a new meaning. It is the old water-pot, but its water has been changed into wine. It is the old letter with a new spirit. It is the old body with a new soul. Love makes all things new! It changes duty into delight, and statutes into songs.

What a magic difference love makes to a face! It at once becomes a face illumined. Love makes the plainest face winsome and attractive It adds the light of heaven, and the earthly is transfigured. No cosmetics are needed when love is in possession. She will do her own beautifying work, and everybody will know her sign.

What a magic difference love makes in service! The hireling goes about his work with heavy and reluctant feet: the lover sings and dances at his toil. The hireling scamps his work: the lover is always adding another touch, and is never satisfied. Just one more touch! And just another! And so on until the good God shall say that loving "patience has had her perfect work."

Love lights up everything, for she is the light of life. Let her dwell in the soul, and every room in the life shall be filled with the glory of the Lord.

MONDAY, May 26. Genesis 44: 1-17. Love sometimes uses innocent wiles to attain a richer loveliness. The lover defers her letter in order to elicit some deeper expression of love from her beloved. She hides herself for the joy of being sought. She devises means for the ripening of her own fruits.

It is even so with our God. "He waiteth that he may be gracious." He hides himself so that in our search for him we may find some richer treasures of his grace. Our very quest strengthens our sight. First of all, the searching gives us freer eyes and we are more competent to discern his glory. If there were no quest there would be no conquest. And so the Lord hides in order that he may the more gloriously be found.

And there was something of this same spirit in Joseph's relation to his brethren. It was not malice that made him stay the revelation. It was not revenge. It was not the desire to see them suffer torment. His heart was bursting with affection. But he veiled his love in order to lead his brethren to a richer discovery of it. He delayed so that he might provide a more delicious feast. Love tarried for greater loveliness.

TUESDAY, May 27. Genesis 44: 18-26. What a wonderful thing it is that there are so many men and women who are ready to be bondsmen for their fellows! "Let thy servant abide instead of the lad, a bondsman to my lord." This old earth is glorified in ten thousand places by the vicarious deeds of consecrated souls. Vicarious blood is endowed with immeasurable virtue. When life becomes sacrificial it discovers its innermost strength. When men begin to bleed for their fellows they are sowing a holy seed which is sure of glorious harvest. The world would become a harsh and barren desert if the sacrificial life were to become extinct. Take away the readiness of parent to suffer for child, and brother for brother, and friend for friend, and the home of humanity would become worse than the lair of the beast.

But "there is a Friend who sticketh closer than a brother." "He loved me and gave himself for me." "In my place condemned he stood." And there is saving energy in that sacrifice to lift the dead race into life, and health, and beauty. Our Brother can bring us all into the likeness of his grace and holiness. At his cross we may find our crown. In his sorrows we may find our rest. Our lilies of peace grow in the midst of his bitterness, and the flowers of our joy "blossom red" from the ground of his sacrificial love and grace.

WEDNESDAY, May 28. Genesis 44: 27-34. "His life is bound up with the lad's life." And it is our privilege to lift up this human relationship to express a relationship still more glorious and wonderful. It is a dim and clouded reflection of the heavenly Father's intimate love for every one of his children. "Thou shalt be bound up in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God." We are every one bound up in the life of God as flesh and blood are bound up in the life of our body. God is not remote from me as the Matterhorn is remote from me as I labor here in New York. We say of some fond father, "He is just wrapped up in his children!" And our heavenly Father is "wrapped up" in his children. "His life is bound up in the lad's life."

What gentle comfort there is here for every parent, and what inspiration for every teacher in the school! Our children are to be saved, not by the strength of our weakness, but by the glorious energies of divine love. The most intimate of earthly ties is only like a frail and brittle thread when compared with "the tie that binds" us to the heart of God. Our poor grip may fail just when we need it most. But the Father's love "holds fast" through noons and midnights, through life and through death.

O love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul on thee.

THURSDAY, May 29. Psalm 130. "With the Lord there is mercy." That is the ultimate spring. All the "pilgrims of the night" may meet at that fountain. We have no other common meeting-place. If we make any other appointment we shall lose one another on the way. But we can meet one another at the fountain, men of all colors, and of all denominations, and of all creeds. "By thy mercy, O deliver us, good Lord!"

"There is forgiveness with thee." That is the quickening river. Sin and guilt scorch the fair garden of the soul as the lightning withers and destroys the strong and beautiful things in woodland and field. The graces are stricken, holy qualities are smitten, and the soul languishes like a blasted heath. But from the fountain of God's mercy there flows the vitalizing stream of his forgiveness. "There is a river the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God." It is the mystic "river of life, clear as crystal." "Everything shall live whither the river cometh."

"With Him is plenteous redemption." Salvation is not merely a recovered flower, it is a recovered garden. It is not the restoring merely of a withered hand; "He restoreth my soul." God does not make an oasis in a surrounding desert; he makes the entire wilderness to "rejoice and blossom as the rose." His redemption is plenteous. "All that is within me" shall "bless and praise his holy name."

FRIDAY, May 30. Romans 2: 1-11. "There is no respect of persons with God." All human distinctions vanish in the light of his presence. Our positions and our possessions can offer no bribe. The secret things of the soul are the only things that are seen. The blazing light of truth is like some mystic Röntgen ray, and "there is nothing hid that shall not be revealed." "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God," in the impartial light of his holiness.

But if our lives are to be tested by the equal scales of judgment, so also are we all to be equally privileged in the glorious bounties of his grace. No one is received into paradises from which another is expelled. There was no garden of exclusive privilege for the apostle Paul. The slave Onesimus shared all the spiritual resources of the great apostle. He drank the same "cup of salvation." He ate the same "bread of life." He was equipped in the same armors. He enjoyed the unbroken friendship of the same Lord. Onesimus and Philemon walked side by side in the realms of grace.

Every soul is therefore prospective heir to the "unsearchable riches of Christ." We are all millionaires in the treasures of eternal love. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me praise his holy name."

SATURDAY, May 31. Galatians 6: 1-8. This is a surgical operation in the realm of the soul. A man has been "overtaken in a fault," some evil passion has pounced upon him, and he is broken. Some holy relationship has been snapped, and he is crippled in his moral and spiritual goings. Perhaps his affections have been broken, or his conscience, or his will. Or perhaps he has lost his glorious hope or the confidence of his faith. Here he is, a broken man, the victim of his own broken vows, lame and halt in the pilgrim-way! And some surgeon is needed to re-set the dislocation, and to make him whole again.

And who is to be the surgeon? "Ye which are spiritual restore such a one." The men who live under the control of God's Spirit are to be the surgeons for broken hearts and souls. When a man has fallen by reason of sin, the Christian is to be a good Samaritan, seeking to restore the cripple to health and strength again. We are not to add to his injuries by our contempt. We are not to abandon him to his moral helplessness. We are to kneel and minister to him, binding up his wounds, giving him the balm and cordial of oil and wine.

And what is to be the spirit of the surgeon? "The spirit of meekness." We are not to be supercilious, for the "touch" of pride is never the minister of healing. We are to heal as though some day we may need to be healed, "considering thyself," and remembering that the compassion we show to others will some day come knocking at our own door.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

THE MORAL HERO

IT IS said that everybody loves a hero. The kind of hero that people can understand most readily is the physical hero, the man who, either in his own bodily strength or through the force which he controls, achieves tremendous results. At the dedication of the Grant Monument in New York a few years ago, several hundred thousand people joined hearts and voices to do honor to the memory of a man who, so far as most of them had eyes to see, was only a physical hero; one who had overcome force with force, one who had triumphed in a struggle the results of which depended on visible and material resources. They honored the hero who had played such a momentous part in the preservation of our nation as a unit. The greater hero most of them did not think of at all, and yet he was the same man—the man who conquered himself.

To know the story of General Grant's life is to know what that means. There was a period in his young manhood when he came perilously near to ruin and had nothing else in prospect but oblivion. There was hardly another man among the graduates of West Point who had dropped so completely out of sight. But the hour struck and the man in him awoke. Very quietly, but with splendid heroism, he gathered up the reins of character which had been lying loose so long, and took himself in hand. That noble grasp was never relaxed; it grew stronger and stronger until, when he sheathed his sword at the end of our historic struggle for a principle, as modest, as brave, as magnanimous a soldier as ever lived, he stood before the world the impersonation of self-mastery, a character which for beautiful simplicity and heroic strength may well be a model for generations following.

The moral hero is one who does his strong things in his heart, where motives and purposes are the battleground. There are many who will never have great monuments reared to their memory, who live and die without recognition from their fellow men; but they will not be forgotten when the crowns are given out by the hand of the Righteous Judge.

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION'S BUSY SUMMER IN WASHINGTON

BY ABBY GUNN BAKER

ALL signs agree that summer, with its temperature so often at tropical register in Washington, is nearly with us, and the signs are equally as sure that for the better part of the summer, no matter how hot it may be, Congress is to be in session. No one who is acquainted with Congress and who has watched the proceedings at the Capitol building since the extra session began, can doubt that last statement. The committees have been appointed with all the care that marks the opening of a regular session. There have been the usual heart-burnings over the assignment of committee-rooms; and while the extra session was called ostensibly to regulate the tariff only, not a day has passed but that innumerable bills, covering almost every subject under the shining blue, have been introduced in both the House and Senate.

But the chief reason why the extra session will not be brief is the change of party politics which came in with the new administration. It has been sixteen years since a Democratic President occupied the White House and longer than that since that party controlled both houses of Congress and had the President too. This brings the party which for so long has been in the minority again into power; and of course there must and will be innumerable changes by which ante-election pledges may be satisfied. One only needs to spend a day in the halls and lobbies of the Capitol to realize that a new administration is in power. The Senate ante-chamber and the marble room are crowded with anxious-faced men and eager-faced women; every doorway leading to the Hall of Representatives is thronged—men old and men young, gray-haired women and girls in their teens, walk unceasingly back and forth from Senate to House, and from House to Senate, waiting to see their members of Congress, upon whom they are depending to put through legislation in which they are interested, or to secure them government positions. The most pathetic place in the whole big building is the southeast corner of Statuary Hall, the little space back of the great monolithic pillars which has been screened off and fitted up as "The Ladies' Lobby" of the House of Representatives. Here the women who have claims before Congress, women who are trying for government positions for themselves or are interceding for some one else, women who are stranded financially and who are hoping for some kind of help, wait to see the members of Congress. The tragedy which is written on some of their faces! A woman is in charge of the lobby and sits at a table by the south window. She has a number of boy pages and by them she sends in the waiting women's cards to the members. So often these patient souls come day after day, full of hope at noon when the day's session of Congress opens, but only to leave as the shades of night settle down over the historic building, with weariness and sorrow and often despair written on their pale faces. There are women to be found there who have claims against Congress and who have haunted the halls of the Capitol for years and years. War claims, pension claims, property claims, and claims of every kind. They come with every session, and while some of their claims are without a shadow of justification and should never be granted, there are others whose claims should have been paid long ago, and this adds to the pathos of the Women's Lobby.

"Every Democratic family in Dixie-land has sent some member of its household to Washington to get a government job under Wilson," said a member of Congress jocularly the other day, and it would look as though he had only half stated the truth to watch the crowds of office-seekers from East, West, North and South, who have filled Washington since the fourth of last March. They make life busy not only for the members of Congress, but particularly so for the new President and his cabinet members. When watching the crowded halls and lobbies at the Capitol it would seem as though all the applicants for positions were at the Capitol. It would be thought so unless one spent a morning at the White House or in the departments. Then he would know better. He would find a similar eager, anxious-faced crowd at each place. The President has announced that patronage must wait until the more important matters of state are looked after, and that applications for positions must be made through the cabinet ministers. This was sad, sad news for the office-seekers, but it has not retarded appointments very materially. Nearly all the Republican assistant secretaries in the departments have been replaced by those of the political faith of the administration party, and many of the higher paid positions have been thus changed. Civil service laws have not been disregarded, but it is always expected that the party in power will bring in men of its own faith—and within the limits of Civil Service there is no reason why any one should complain of this. The most noticeable change in Washington, however, is in the Congress itself. The party changes in both the Senate and House are very marked. In the Senate there are now fifty-one Democrats, forty-four Republicans and but one who records himself as a Progressive, although the latter party will probably hold the balance of power when the two leading parties split on any issue and it may be able to control from fifteen to twenty votes at any time. In the House of Representatives the change politically is far more marked than in the Senate. Where two years ago that body was overwhelmingly Republican, there are now two hundred and ninety Democrats against one hundred and twenty-seven Republicans, while but seventeen register as Progressives.

It is interesting also to note that over half of the members of the House were born on farms, and while almost half of them, two hundred and ninety to be exact, record themselves as lawyers a good many of them still claim to be farmers or to be living in villages. Seventy-eight of them are engaged in various kinds of mercantile business, twenty-four are newspaper men, several are engaged in iron or steel manufactories of various kinds, thirteen are educators, five are doctors, one is a dentist, one is a pharmacist, one is a horticulturist, one a naval architect, one a hatter, one a printer, two are authors, one a telegrapher, one a soldier, one an electrician, one a chemist, and one a minister. The minister of the Gospel who has become a member of Congress is Rev. Henry Willson Temple of Washington, Pa. He was a Presbyterian pastor and had charge of several Pennsylvania churches before becoming professor of history and political science at Washington and Jefferson College in 1905. It is surprising the number of men who are in the sixty-third session of Congress who were elected on reform and progressive principles. But one only needs to study the personnel of this Congress to realize that the people throughout the country took the view that some reform was necessary. Both of the old parties are filled with men who, like Senator Kenyon of Iowa, plainly told his constituents that he stood for principle and not party. Said he in his address to the Iowa legislature, "I shall go back to Washington to stand with the right. I shall vote with my party whenever she is right, and when she is wrong I shall vote against her."

This Congress is also notable for the men who are actively identified with religious, moral, and philanthropic movements. Mr. Edmund Platt, the editor of the Poughkeepsie Eagle, who was elected to the sixty-third Congress as a Republican, had long used the editorial columns of his paper in the interest of civic betterment, and for the higher moral standard of the community. He was a director of the Poughkeepsie Chamber of Commerce, member of several city administrative boards, yet he found time to be actively identified in the council for the Boy Scouts, a director in the Vassar Brothers' Educational Institute, and a member of the governing board of the Dutch Reformed Church, with which he has long been affiliated. Mr. John R. Clancy, the new Democratic member from Syracuse, for years has been associated with the important civic and charitable undertakings of his city. He was president of the Central Hospital Council which succeeded in placing all Syracuse hospitals on a business basis, which enables them to run without financial embarrassment, and he was founder and secretary of the Central New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

It was not so long ago when members of Congress were most suggestively silent on the subject of temperance, woman suffrage, and labor questions, and even yet it would not be hard to find those in both chambers who do not blow a trumpet to call attention to their views on such subjects. But there is a surprising number among both the new and old members who unhesitatingly take their places on the side of the right when a moral issue is brought to the front. Mr. Abercrombie, the new member at large from Alabama, is a deacon in his home church, the Baptist, and stands unflinchingly for State-wide prohibition and for woman suffrage. Mr. Charles Thomson is a member of the City Club of Chicago, the live organization for civic betterment in the great Western metropolis. For three terms he has served on the city council, where he has fought unflinchingly for civic righteousness, and he too is an active church man, a member of the Presbyterian denomination. Melville Clyde Kelly, elected from the thirtieth Pennsylvania district, editor of the Braddock Daily News-Herald, is widely known for his Christian activities. He has long been one of the board of trustees of the Presbyterian Church of his city. In connection with the Sunday school of the church, he has one of the largest Bible classes for young men in the country. Percy Edwards Quinn of Mississippi is the son of a Baptist minister, an earnest church worker, and has made a splendid record in his State in reformatory endeavors.

THE DAUGHTER OF A SOLDIER

BY MARY STEWART CUTTING

A Decoration Day Story Complete in This Issue. See Front Cover.

OH, Miss Minnie—Elizabeth couldn't work in a factory! That would be impossible."

Mrs. Garland's delicate features had taken on a permanent droop since her early widowhood, but they were unusually agitated now; her fingers trembled on the baby-socks she was crocheting, and which, disposed of with painful secrecy at the Exchange, as beseemed the past grandeur of the family, had netted the mother and daughter the munificent sum of five dollars in the past year.

"But it isn't working in the factory—though I can't see anything degrading in that!—it's just helping Miss Dominick in the office with the books. It's really an opportunity for Elizabeth. She's so bright, she's sure to make her way."

Miss Felter spoke encouragingly, though it was the fifth time this morning she had gone over the same ground. She was always encouraging the people whom she sought to assist. For thirty-five of her sixty years Miss Felter had helped men and women to situations in which they could earn a wage; she was an adept in patiently showing square people how to trim off the corners so they might fit into round holes, when, as only too often happened, they had to take what they could get instead of what they wanted. She was a high-nosed, plain-featured woman, whose reasonable kind-heartedness had become so heavenly a principle that neither ingratitude nor indolence nullified it. She gazed now at Elizabeth's lovely, half-averted face as she stood behind her mother's carved arm chair in the center of the old-fashioned, stately, shabby room, and strove to think how she might reach the child.

"It's very nice to feel that you are really helping," she urged.

"Oh, but the publicity!" protested Mrs. Garland, who had been born a Burling, and one of the owners of the town, still more agitatedly. "Elizabeth could never stand the hours and the confinement, not to speak of the companionship,—and all for such a mere pittance! Besides, I don't see how she could take the time now, with all our summer things to be fixed over and the housework to do. I don't think there's any use in considering it at all, Miss Minnie, or at any rate, not until we hear from Mr. Rufus Garland."

"Well, think over it," said Miss Minnie, rising. She knew very well, as far as Elizabeth was concerned, that she might be prodded and she might be helped, but when it came to the main thing, she would have to do it herself—the spirit for it must be in her.

"Well, I'm glad she's gone," said the mother with a sigh, when the visitor had departed. "Poor Miss Minnie! She means well. I wish you'd get the water now, Elizabeth, before you go for the mail."

"I will in a moment, mother; I can't cross the street while those two men are standing right in front of the house, I'd be too ashamed for anything to walk past them with the bucket, and with Miss Davis there at the corner, too!" Elizabeth's face was flushed, and there was a suspicion of tears in her voice.

Mrs. Garland's work slipped from her hands. "If you knew how badly it made me feel to have you obliged to do such menial work—you, a Burling!—you wouldn't speak about it that way, Elizabeth. It worries me dreadfully to have you carry that heavy pail! It was outrageous of Micky to refuse to do the chores any more."

"We didn't have the money to pay him," stated Elizabeth extenuatingly. She stood by the window, looking out, her slender figure, in the faded blue gingham gown, drooping a little. Her profile had a spirited, aquiline curve very different from that of Mrs. Garland, but she had the same look of plaintive timidity and discontent. Of the two men who were still talking outside, one was Connors, the manager of the factory of which Miss Minnie had spoken; his shrewd, kindly, Irish face gave her a feeling of terror in connection with the factory. It had always been the haunting dread of her life that she might have to come down to a place in the "works." The other man was young, with something peculiarly alert and fine in his expression. The cut of his clothes, the very way he held himself, showed that he came from that greater world which it was Elizabeth's birthright to know. She had heard of his being at a tea given by Miss Davis to which she hadn't been asked; he was a Mr. Howard Dare, who was said to have succeeded wonderfully under difficulties; he had "made his own way." If one only had opportunities like a man!

While she was waiting to cross the street, she reverted suddenly to the subject that had occupied the minds and conversations of both women since Cousin Rufus Garland's return to the West, after that brief visit from him two months before.

"Do you suppose we shall get the letter from Cousin Rufus to-day?"

"Well, Elizabeth, you know what he said—that we would hear from him anyway by the twenty-eighth of May. He said that he considered that he owed your father a debt, and he wanted to do what he could to pay it. He showed a great deal of feeling when he spoke of it, and he made me tell him about the mortgage, too. If we had a few hundred dollars now we might go away for a little while. I'm sure we need a change, and you could have new clothes, dear. If I could only give you advantages, Elizabeth—you don't know how badly I feel because you don't have the chances a girl ought to have. Of course I know there's no one here whom you would care to marry, but if the right kind of a man came along—"

"Oh, mother, please don't!" It was the last straw when Mrs. Garland went on a visionary search after suitors.

"There, those men are going now; I'll get the water."

She caught up the big tin pail and ran from the house and down the wide steps of the broad piazza, out under the green elms and across the grass-bordered street to the well of the unoccupied house opposite; their own water supply had been condemned as unfit for use, and there was no money to have the well cleaned: the well-house was tumbling down like the large old mansion itself, with its broken steps and scaling paint. Elizabeth's mother had been the last Burling to inherit it after that gay youth abroad, where she had been a beauty and a belle before Grandfather Burling lost all but a remnant of the wealth which had been gradually departing for years. She had married a stranger from the West; Mrs. Garland still wept when she spoke of him, but then she wept when she said the flour was out or the milk was sour. Elizabeth knew very little about her father, who had died when she was a year old, except that she looked like him. The Burlings had indeed always been very great people in Burlingsville, in a wealthy, alien sort of way, spending most of their time abroad: the thought of this past greatness was answerable now for the crimson flush on Elizabeth's face as she looked up and down the street, and gave her that feeling of bitterness over the neglects and slights of the "new people," such as Miss Davis, who hadn't asked Elizabeth to her tea, while she worked the windlass and drew up the bucket, with all the strength of her young arms. The pail was full almost to overflowing as she started back with it; she did not want to repeat the trip. As she looked down to steady it the sound of a suddenly-beaten drum made her give an involuntary jump that sent a splash of water over her low-shod feet.

"Please allow me," said a voice at one side. The young man whom she had noticed before had turned in parting from Miss Davis, who was disappearing around the corner radiant in her spring attire; his hat was still in one gloved hand, while with the other he took the pail from Elizabeth.

"Where do you want it—over there?" He obeyed her indicating look, and with a few lengthy strides, deposited his burden on the door sill.

"It's not so heavy for me as for you." His bright smile seemed to admit her into some pleasant fellowship before he had put on his hat, after her murmured thanks, and was off down the road once more under the greening elms.

Mrs. Garland called out: "What are the drums beating for, Elizabeth?" and she answered:

"Oh, they're getting ready for Decoration Day, I suppose," before she too went slowly down the village street toward the post office. The thought of the stranger and his instant, straightforward service—"though I wasn't dressed up at all," she said to herself—made an interesting event, that almost blottd out those noisy drums.

From a tiny child, Elizabeth had cried when she heard their strident beating, and even now that she was older they gave her a strange feeling that came from more than the reiterated sound. Something rose in her bosom, she couldn't tell what, or why—the stirring of unknown forces, that overwhelmed and frightened her.

The fact that they were beating now gave added fright and grimness to that other fact that the descent into poverty was becoming more rapid every day. She had grown up, indeed, with the insistently weighting thought that when the money gave out she would have to "do something"—but what? It could only be something very elegant, and with large profit. Teaching was always respectable, but she didn't know enough to teach, even if there had been any position open in Burlingsville. Every plan was subject to a withering criticism, a paralyzing indecision, a timidity as to any public descent that made effort well nigh impossible. It was a usual thing indeed that girls should earn a living—no one thought any the less of them, yet she had the individual feeling that for her—a Burling—it was a terrible fall from the social position to which she was born; she would be dropped out of everything; it simply couldn't be allowed: something must happen to prevent it. She, a Burling! She had never thought of herself as a Garland; it had been rather an unexpected pleasure to find the unknown cousin Rufus from Oregon a man of whom nobody need be ashamed, although he was so Western. If he kept his implied promise—

"Good-morning, Miss Garland!"

Elizabeth's heart gave a thump; the worst had befallen her; this was Connors who was speaking.

"You're lookin' like the mont' of May yourself." His shrewd eyes regarded her kindly, he bent to whisper, with a jerk of his thumb over his shoulder, "Miss Felter—she's after speakin' to me of a job for you. She and I, we've made it up between us—she's a great sort! Well, if you go to the office a-Monda' I'm thinkin' 'twill be all right; I gave Miss Dominick the tip; she's a dago, but she's all right, she is—it's an openin' for a bright girl that's good at figures, and a bright one's what we been lookin' for. Eight a week's no great forchune, but it's eight a week annyhow. It's a wonder how much more a few dollars looks to be when 'tis in your hand!"

"Oh, Mr. Connors!" cried Elizabeth with panic in her voice. Her face became white, she felt as if she must sink to the ground with shame. The Miss Belfords were just passing. What must they think? "Please don't speak about it now. I can't decide. I can't stop; I'll let you know!"

She almost ran the rest of the way to the post office. The loathed factory! To be seen taking her place with the "push" that streamed in at the gates in the early morning and out of them tired and work-bedraggled when the long day was done! To be under Miss Dominick, who walked out on Sunday with a young man who smoked a pipe! To be all day imprisoned, never to have any of the social daylight pleasures the "other girls" had! To be looked down on as she knew she would be by all the new people!

"Oh, mother, mother, the letter's come! Mother, the letter's come!" Elizabeth's deliriously excited voice went ahead of her; she dashed into the living room with sparkling eyes, her fair cheeks radiantly glowing. She stooped to embrace the little mother and the two clung together for a moment with the joy of an unspeakable relief. "The letter is for me—such a thick one!" Elizabeth threw off her hat, and sitting on a low stool with her elbows on her mother's lap, tore open the envelope, and read:

"DEAR COUSIN ELIZABETH:

"I reckon you've been expecting to hear from me before this, but I felt that I had some things to say that took quite a lot of planning and thinking over first. I told you I wanted to do something to help, that I felt I had a right to.

"I went around to your lawyer's before I left, and he's going to see about having that mortgage on the place extended for a couple of years. I'll see that the interest is paid. I guess you won't have any trouble with it. And I've made arrangements to have the house put in shape a little. There was just about so much I'd portioned out that I could spend, and what was left after the house and mortgage were allowed for, I've put into something else that maybe you didn't expect.

"I reckon you haven't ever heard much about your father, he dying when you were so young, and your mother's people being the whole show, and naturally so, in the place you live in. But one thing sort of hurt me—not that it's your mother's fault; if she had money, I reckon it's one of the first things she'd use it for—it sort of hurt me that day you took me to the cemetery to see that your father's grave hadn't any stone on it. So I took the liberty of ordering one—a plain granite shaft, as good a one as I could get, with the condition that it should be put up for Decoration Day. Captain Finch of the G. A. R. Post is to superintend the ceremony."

"A gravestone!" said Mrs. Garland blankly, "when we—" A motion of her hand conveyed the irony of the situation.

After a dead pause Elizabeth went on:

"Perhaps you've never heard about your father's record in the Civil War. I gave it to Captain Finch, but there's just a little incident I'd like to tell you myself—it happened at the siege of Vicksburg. One day when the firing was pretty fierce a soldier was

Peace—and Memorial Day

IT IS a most delightful fact that as Memorial Day dawns this year there are a number of impressive and promising signs pointing the way to the long-wished-for era of universal peace. It is true that the air of Europe is agitated not only by the memory of the terrible campaigns of recent months, but with fears of possible renewals of strife; it is true that the United States has been facing a grave issue with an Oriental Power; but it is also true that things are happening which emphasize above the glamour and the memory of war the greater glory of peace.

The North and South on Memorial Day rehearse the splendor of the courage shown on our battlefields of the Civil War. Tears fall afresh at the recollection of the sufferings that were borne, and the brave lives that the war snuffed out. But it is most fitting that on this day when we review the courage and the glory of the past we should look forward toward the bright dawn of universal peace.

Perhaps most important as a hopeful sign is the suggestion made by Secretary Bryan, and indorsed by President Wilson and presented to the Senate to be made into the form of a bill, that the United States enter into treaties with all other nations, agreeing that whenever a point of dispute arises, from six months to a year shall be spent in official investigation before war is declared. The substance of such an agreement was not only presented to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, but was also handed to the diplomatic representatives of foreign governments at Washington. So far, the suggestion has met with most friendly comment. Every one can see at once its thorough reasonableness. It is a clear fact of history that a large percentage of wars have been chiefly the result of sudden passion. Nations are aroused to wrath just as individuals, and at the moment of their wrath they insist upon fighting. The suggestion that they wait to cool off is met with scorn. The old advice to count ten before speaking when angry is sound and excellent. If followed it would prevent most of the bitter words now spoken. If applied and extended to nations it will do much to avert war. It is likely that this bill will quickly pass Congress and that these new treaties will speedily be made.

Shortly after this movement was started by the Washington administration a distinguished group of peace delegates from England and Canada visited the United States for the purpose of making arrangements to celebrate in 1915 the centennial of peace between the British Empire and America. This celebration will be one in which all nations can participate through their official representatives. The advantages of arbitration as a permanent means of adjusting international disputes will be thus set forth in a practical way before the whole world. It must be apparent to all that not only have the two nations affected been satisfied with the results of arbitration, but that the honorable avoidance of war, with its criminal waste of human life and natural resources and its measureless sorrow and suffering, outweighs all other considerations. Yet in these ninety-eight years there have been several occasions on which national feelings of good will have been strained well-nigh to the breaking point. But the calmer judgment of both countries chose the civilized method of settling these disputes according to the principles of law and justice.

Coincident with these two hopeful occurrences came the Fourth American Peace Congress which met at St. Louis on the first four days of May, at which over two hundred delegates from North and South America were present. The Congress demonstrated that both the common sense and the conscience of mankind are steadily leading the civilized nations away from the horrors of warfare.

One of the most hopeful signs of the peace movement has been the growing hatred of war in the hearts of the masses everywhere. It is the common people, who are not themselves the makers of war, that must ultimately be the means of its decline. We have seen a whole nation of workers on strike for the ballot in Belgium. The day may come when we shall see the men of a nation on strike against a needless war.

We honor to-day the brave men who heard the call of duty when it sounded a half century ago. Soon the nation will meet reverently at the field of Gettysburg to commemorate there the dauntless courage of the men who fought and died upon that ghastly field. We have the same need of courage still. We should be brave in peace as our sires were brave in war. We should pray, with fervent hope, that the fair fields of America shall never again be drenched with the blood of battles, and that all nations shall speedily yield themselves to the sweet power of peace.

The Wider Horizon

WHEN we begin to realize that the spiritual life has boundless possibilities, and that, in contrast with the natural life, it has practically no limitations, we are making one of the greatest of discoveries. Real Christianity must be progressive. As with the children of Israel, the divine voice gives us the order to "go forward." We are not to be content with a minor degree of efficiency; but with hearts full of courage we must press on to grander aims and wider effort in the service of God and humanity. In doing this we are working in harmony with all the spiritual forces and with God himself, who gives us the assurance of being able to do all things in him. Elijah knew that the whole host of heaven was ready to fight on his side. So invisible spiritual forces fight the battle of Christians to-day. If we have the faith and the courage to "go forward," God will make every jungle a clear path for us, and every impediment will become a stepping-stone to success.

Herein is a mighty lesson for the "timid Christian." To win this divine co-operation we must zealously cultivate those qualities that go to make up the sum of Christian efficiency. Our life must have a plan and a purpose. Since divine love has done so much for us, we must dedicate in return the best there is in us to the service of God. We set our own boundaries. The Christian who has never known the desire for service, whose heart has never thrilled with the "passion for souls," has missed much of the joy and meaning of life, while he who has gone forward in faith and courage to wider tasks never fails to feel the hand of Omnipotence leading him to triumph.

The March of the Women

ALL of New York's gallantry was aroused by the suffrage parade. As the 10,000 women, garbed in immaculate white gowns, swept along Fifth Avenue with flags fluttering and bands playing, the entire metropolis turned out to gaze upon the prettiest procession it had ever witnessed. There was nothing martial about it; yet the paraders, marching eight abreast and every woman in the long line looking her best and stepping with a jauntiness that bespoke serene confidence in herself and the cause, gave to the multitude of onlookers a new thrill such as no similar event had ever imparted. American they were mostly, and they were happy in their holiday, though the weather was a trifle warm, and they were especially fortunate in the fact that every spectator was contrasting them favorably with the militant suffragists who, by their rampant violence have made the movement so unpopular in England where suffrage has just been killed in the Common by a decisive majority. Altogether the parade was a graceful and dignified spectacle, pleasing to the eye and creditable to the organizers and to all concerned. If one had any doubt as to the kind of women who want to vote, he could there find them drawn from all ranks and conditions of life, with a plentiful sprinkling of wealth, social position and professional talent.

How much more convincing of the worth of womanhood is this pacific display than the militant plan with its hysterical battering at the doors of Parliament, blowing up of country-houses, wrecking of plate-glass windows and letter boxes, burning of railway stations and grandstands, and its plots to kidnap cabinet ministers! It has been wittily said that the average American man thinks so highly of the American woman that, should the sex ever get the suffrage, it will be conceded because, besides his conviction of the justice of it, he will be moved by the sense of gallantry, which, after all, is one of the most potent influences in human affairs.

The Crossed Over

WHEN a good man passes away in the midst of a career of Christian activities, the whole world is the loser. In the removal by death of Charles H. Mead, D.D., pastor, evangelist, philanthropist and humanitarian, the whole community is a loser and thousands will sincerely mourn the departure of one who had endeared himself to them by a long lifetime of loving service. He was a soul-winner of a rare type, possessing power to make the religion of Jesus attractive to the simple as well as to the learned. In his lips the Gospel found free and convincing expression and his labors were divinely owned in bringing many out of darkness into the light. In the temperance field, there were few advocates who have done more to break the fetters that bind men to the slavery of drink than he, and he was a host in himself wherever the battle waged in a city or State.

For two decades, Dr. Mead was actively associated with the spiritual work of the Bowery Mission and for the last three years of his life he was the Mission's president, succeeding the late Dr. Louis Klopsch. He was also one of the trustees of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home. In both of these benevolent organizations he was a worthy leader, infusing enthusiasm and winning the love and esteem of all with whom he came in contact. His Christian optimism, his boundless geniality and his attractive eloquence, though they will be sadly missed, will be a treasured memory in the years to come. He was truly one of those who have many souls for their hire and who are to "shine as the stars forever and ever." If every one he helped should drop a flower of remembrance on his resting-place in Greenwood, a monument of fragrance would rise above him. His noble, consecrated, self-denying life is his best monument.

So we leave our beloved fellow worker, whose comradeship was so dear while he was with us, and the recollection of whose splendid, well-rounded life we shall cherish as one of the brightest examples of strong, sunny, helpful, practical Christianity it has ever been our privilege to know.

General Notes

—ICELAND, WHICH RECENTLY passed an anti-spirit law, has decided that after the present stock of liquor on the island is consumed, no more alcoholic liquors of any kind will be permitted to be sold in that country.

—BY THE TERMS OF the will of Mr. Ferris S. Thompson, an alumnus of Princeton, '88, who died in Paris February 18, that university will ultimately be the wealthier by some three millions of dollars. Several years ago he gave the university a $50,000 gateway for its athletic field, and now he has left it, outright, 1,000 shares of the Chase National Bank, which yields an income of 20 per cent., and has been quoted between 675 and 700. It also receives his residuary estate, which will exceed $2,000,000 upon the death of his widow. But there are a number of other public bequests, the largest, $200,000, to Mercy Hospital, Chicago. The Salvation Army forces in New York City and in San Francisco receive $50,000 each, and a similar sum goes to the Episcopal Church of the Holy Trinity in Paris, France. Several sums go to various religious and philanthropic enterprises in New Bedford, Mass., and a number of private persons are also "remembered" in liberal financial terms.

Dedication of Jefferson Memorial

THE $450,000 Jefferson Memorial in Forest Park, St. Louis, Mo., was dedicated on the 30th of April, which was the tenth anniversary of the dedication of the Louisiana Purchase Exposition. The largest throng the park ever saw, with one exception, since the exposition, gathered to witness the exercises. The exercises were preceded by an imposing parade. The heroic statue of Jefferson was unveiled by Miss Natalie Norton, a descendant of the illustrious Revolutionary statesman. Ex-Governor David R. Francis presided and in a brief address presented the keys of the Memorial Building to Mayor Kiel, who accepted them in appropriate remarks. Many distinguished persons were present, among them Governor Major of Missouri and Governor Dunne of Illinois, who, with their gold-laced staffs, were conspicuous figures in the parade. There was also unveiled in the building a tablet commemorating the Louisiana Purchase Treaty. America was singularly fortunate in the great and good men who founded the commonwealth. It was natural that a man of the great intellectual force and patriotism of Thomas Jefferson should have been selected to write the Declaration of Independence, whose adoption marked the nation's birthday. It so happened that the anniversary of the nation's birthday was the day of Jefferson's death. He died on the fourth day of July, 1826. It so chanced that John Adams, who had signed with him the Declaration of Independence, died on the same day and about the same hour. The great leaders in the foundation of the nation differed as to the policy to be pursued. Washington, John Adams, Hamilton and Jay favored a strong central government, while Jefferson led the forces that asked for States' rights and a restricted Federal government. The party that Jefferson led was called Anti-Federal at first, then Republican, then Democratic, which was at first a term of reproach. So he is looked upon as the founder of the Democratic Party. The most important thing about Jefferson's administration as President was his purchase of the Louisiana Province from France for $15,000,000, which added to the new nation an empire of fabulous wealth, material, mental, moral and political. It was after the World's Fair celebration of this purchase that nearly a half million of dollars was found left over in the treasury of the exposition, which was fittingly employed in providing the Jefferson Memorial. As a leader of the nation out into liberty, and as one providing a veritable Canaan for it in the new territory, the memorial to him calls to mind the memorial stones set up to commemorate the leading of a nation into liberty and plenty.

And these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever. (Joshua 4: 7.)

Allowance Was Too Small

A GIRL of fifteen in New York was in great distress. The trouble was, she could not get her expenses inside of her income. She came out behind each month. It was true she had an allowance of $14,000 a year, but how could she be expected to get along on so small an amount as $276.50 a week, or $36 a day? The extremity of distress was reached when she found that the outfit in which she expected to celebrate the resurrection of Christ would cost $1,500, and that she positively did not have that much money on hand for the purpose. Relief came, however. For her uncle and guardian got from the surrogate an additional allowance of $6,000, and with proper economy she is expected to get along with her $380 a week, or $54 a day. This annual outlay for one person is awfully extravagant when compared with the condition of thousands of her sisters who are struggling to support themselves, and some of them widowed mothers and orphan brothers and sisters as well, on pitifully inadequate weekly or monthly salaries. There was never a time when rich people gave so generously to body, mind and soul as now. And yet there is a wicked extravagance among some of them which tends to elevate the cost of living and lower the standard of morals. There is enormous waste on the fictitious things of life, on establishments and equipages, and wardrobes, and functions, and vanities, and pleasures, which could be dispensed with to the advantage of the health, morals and happiness of themselves, and to the prosperity of their fellows. The apostle gives this message to persons of wealth, urging them to pay attention to the eternal verities rather than to the fictitious things of life:

That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life. (I Tim. 6: 18, 19.)

Little Captain a Martyr

THREE little "wharf rats" in Brooklyn, aged eight, ten, and twelve years, made a raft out of some planks, boxes and driftwood of one kind or another the other day and started out to navigate the East River. The oldest one was the proud captain, the other two completed the crew that loyally obeyed orders. They were having the time of their lives when a ferry-boat coming along kicked up such high waves that the raft was broken to pieces and the boys thrown into the river. A deck hand on the ferry-boat seeing the accident jumped into the water and swam to the rescue. He went to the little captain first, who said: "Leave me to the last. Save them other fellers; they are littler than me; besides, I got 'em into it." He meant that he had conceived the trip of navigation and had persuaded his companions to join him. The deck-hand obeyed the orders of the captain and swam to safety with the smallest, then he took the one next older, but before he could get back, the little captain, unable to hold out any longer, had sunk for the third time, and it was the lifeless body of the boy that he found by diving. The property owned by the municipality of New York has just been assessed at $1,500,000,000, and yet that is not so precious a treasure as the elements of true manhood manifested in the street urchin hero, who had physical bravery, who acknowledged responsibility for having led his companions into danger, who was willing to bear the penalty of his rashness rather than have it fall on them, and who manifested an unselfishness and a sacrifice Christlike in its spirit. These are the materials found in places however obscure or unfortunate out of which the best civilization is built. These qualities of manliness in embryo in the little captain are the ones enjoined by the apostle:

Quit you like men, be strong. (I Cor. 16: 13.)

Bible Inscribed by Ruskin

AT a book auction in London the other day a Bible sold for $1,275. The value of the book was partly in its age, being a Vulgate, an illuminated manuscript of the fourteenth century, and partly in the fact that the fly leaf contained the autograph of John Ruskin. This is the inscription: "Laurence Hilliard, with John Ruskin's hope that he will keep this book in memory of better times. April 7, 1875." Ruskin referred often to the influence of the Bible on his mental and religious life. He told how his mother taught it to him, and had him memorize whole chapters of the Old and New Testaments and recite them. He bore tribute to the wisdom as well as conscience of his Christian mother in doing so. His was the testimony of the Psalmist:

Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. (Ps. 119: 105.)

The Fabulous Waste of War

A NEWSPAPER writer has just called attention to the colossal armaments of the nations of Europe and to their wicked extravagance. The six great Powers of Europe which compose the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente are spending for military equipments not less than two billion dollars a year. To this fabulous amount can be added another billion dollars from the money loss of the soldiers who are diverted from the productive callings of life into this trade of slaughter. These three billion dollars only measure the material waste to feed the nation's vanity, or jealousy, or avarice, or to allay its fear. In time of action there is the merciless, causeless slaughter of the flower of a nation and a hiding of all its glory behind a veil of tears. The rise of the Balkan Allies, a powerful military combination on the flank of Austria-Hungary, has stirred Germany with alarm to increased extravagance in military preparations, and France to follow her example in this regard. In the earlier stages of the race, when animalism predominated, force seemed to be necessary to mastery and to the progress from barbarism to civilization. Almost all of the great sins of the world have had to be shot down. Now, under the era of Christ, love is the masterful instrument, and Christian civilization relies for its progress upon love and peace as the dominant factors. Once it was the right of might that conquered. It seems a parody and mockery that at this time, when most parliaments and rulers are declaring for peace, the world should be thrown into such a great tumult of war. But these irritations, and frictions, and conflicts, and shifting of the centers of power in continents, are only hastening the day toward which Christ looked, and for which he gave his life, when all the questions that used to be settled on the battlefield may be settled by the pen of diplomacy, and Christ's peace that makes fresh the individual heart may make fresh the hearts of the nations of mankind—that day when

They shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks: nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. (Micah 4: 3.)

Endowment for Cancer Cure

TIME was when millionaires were few; now they can be found almost anywhere. Mr. Henry Rutherford, a resident of Grand Isle, Vt., who died at a hotel in New York City a few weeks ago, left an estate of a million dollars, and he escaped oblivion by leaving $200,000 as an endowment fund for the study of a cure for cancer. The money was left to the Rockefeller Institute in New York. After some bequests to nearer relatives, Mr. Rutherford, who was a bachelor, left the remaining $500,000 to sixty-four cousins. This man took a portion of his material dollars, and by the alchemy of benevolence turned them into sympathy, love, and the divine ministry of easing the excruciating pain and checking the horrid ravages of a most loathsome disease, and arranged those dollars so that they should take his place by the side of the patient as physician and friend for thousands of years to come. And the voice of his Master will be heard to say:

Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me. (Matt. 25: 40.)

SUFFRAGE PARADE A RIOT OF COLOR

NEW YORK has long since gotten over the shock and the amusement that the first straggling parade of the woman suffragists gave it and has come to expect something rather fine and dignified. The 4th of May was marked this year by a suffrage parade that called forth the sincerest admiration of the throngs that gathered to watch the women and their little group of male supporters march by. Though the hopes of the organizers were sadly disappointed by the fact that of their anticipated 30,000 marchers only 9,613 appeared, they may well be proud of the showing made. Last year's official figures were 9,600, and it was announced that this year would see as marked an increase as the 1912 parade showed over the 1911 display of hardly 3,000. It was not in size but in marching, organization and arrangements that this year's parade outshone all the others. The color schemes had been carefully planned and the women who composed the parade seemed to have advanced as much in ability to follow the directions of their leaders as those leaders themselves in powers of organization.

Splendid police arrangements made the way clear and kept in check the 150,000 people who lined the route from Washington Arch up Fifth Avenue and through Fifty-seventh Street to Carnegie Hall. At the Public Library a big reviewing stand had been erected and there a group of city officials gathered and bowed their respects to the various divisions of the marchers.

It was a well arranged parade, and when Miss Inez Milholland gave the signal for the start from Washington Square it was with the assurance that the various sections were all ready to fall in from their waiting stations in the side streets. Led by a line of mounted traffic policemen, a cavalcade of sixteen horsewomen with a herald and a standard-bearer formed the head of the parade. Each rider wore a purple, white and green cockade in her straw riding-hat, and the bridles of the horses were trimmed with the same colors. The groups that followed accentuated the kaleidoscopic color effect. The white clothing of the majority of the paraders made a dazzling background for the sashes and pennants and streamers of yellow that predominated. The students in the college divisions that represented Vassar, Wellesley, Barnard, Bryn Mawr, Goucher, Adelphi and other institutions wore academic costumes and the lavish display of their college colors added another note of brilliancy to the scene. The members of the Women's Equal Franchise Society were dressed in white and blue and made a splendid appearance. All the various organizations that are agitating for the granting of woman suffrage were represented, and the result was a parade the impressiveness of which no one could gainsay. Divided into senatorial and assembly district groups, the members of the Women's Political Union were followed by the divisions from the various cities of the State of New York.

There were nine women, one from each of the States in which woman suffrage has already been granted, each carrying a banner representative of her State. The section composed of the women who attracted so much attention by their hikes to Albany and Washington were in heavy marching order despite the temperature and they received a good round of applause.

As in other years, the divisions of various callings and professions attracted considerable attention. There were four hundred public school teachers with one hundred private school teachers and several hundred students. Then followed the physicians and the lawyers, the architects, nurses, journalists and musicians, all of whom had good-sized representation. There were delegations of actresses, librarians, social settlement workers and investigators. These were followed by the representatives of "the countries where women vote. This was the most picturesque division of the whole parade, for Norway, Sweden, Finland, New Zealand, Australia and Denmark were all represented by women in national costume. The business and industrial women were represented in the parade by groups of real estate and insurance agents, secretaries, bookkeepers, "steno-typists," printers and milliners and dressmakers, white goods and shirtwaist-makers, and the procession ended with the hairdressers, manicurists, laundresses, tea-room attendants and motorists.

A SECTION OF THE SUFFRAGIST PARADE PASSING UP FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

FRESH CONQUESTS IN INDIA

THIRTY converts were recently baptized in India in the midst of most dramatic surroundings. Brahman reformers were visiting the village, and spent several hours trying to persuade the new converts to renounce the Christian faith. Meanwhile there was great excitement in the village. Many were interested in the outcome. While the Brahmans were trying to win back the Christians from their new allegiance, alternately entreating and threatening them, the Christian pastor and his little band of workers spent the time in prayer, crying to God to hold the converts firm. "Prayer won the day. Christ conquered! One by one the thirty people confessed Christ in baptism, and the Brahman reformers stood on the bank of the lake and cursed them all through the baptismal service. Any one knowing India, and knowing the fear in which the Brahmans are held, will not need to be told that these dear converts proved that they had 'the root of the matter in them.' The time of praise and rejoicing at the close of the baptismal service is not easy to describe. 'There was great joy in that village!'"

This incident is related in an interesting letter from Rev. A. S. Paynter, of the India Christian Mission. He acknowledges the receipt of funds for his work, and thanking THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the donors, he adds, "I am thankful to tell you we are meeting with much encouragement. God is doing great things in our midst."

Speaking of the Brahman reformers, he writes: "These Brahman reformers are becoming a serious menace to our work. They travel round the villages, paying particular attention to hamlets we visit, and do all in their power to oppose Christianity. I need not tell you that Brahmans have enormous influence with Hindus of all castes. The zeal of these reformers is astonishing, and in their opposition to our work they even condescend to rub shoulders with Hindus of the lowest castes—people whom they have hitherto called 'the untouchables.' This opposition is causing us no little anxiety, and we fear much that unless we are speedily enabled to send Christian teachers to the many villages who are begging for them, the influence of these reformers may spread, and the doors that are now wide open may be closed. Oh that I could make friends in the homelands see the unique opportunity God has given us! We have earnest, repeated calls from scores of heathen villages all around us—villages in which there is not a single Christian. For lack of funds to support pastors we cannot respond to these appeals. We face the opportunity of opening one hundred new village stations at once, and with the almost certain prospects of winning the majority of the people in each of these hundred villages to Christ. I wish to thank the many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who are interested in our work for their sympathy, help and prayers. How greatly we value and need the latter I cannot tell you. We have an 'Open Door' set before us, but there are 'many adversaries.' One has to be on the spot to understand the subtlety, malignity and power of the devil in a heathen land. We are just now much in prayer in regard to the starting of a mission rubber and cocoanut plantation. This has been laid on our hearts for years, and we believe the time has now come for the scheme to materialize. Suitable land can be bought, planted up and cared for till it yields a return for $50 per acre. We have a suitable 100-acre block of land in view, and believe the way will be opened up for us to secure it. Friends have already sent us remittances to cover the cost of five acres. Words fail me to tell how greatly such a mission plantation would help the work in enabling us to respond to the repeated calls we have from heathen villages, as well as in the way of providing work for our poorer Christians. I am this month celebrating the thirtieth anniversary of my arrival on the India mission field."

A GROUP OF HIGH-CASTE HINDU INQUIRERS AND THEIR PASTOR

'ESTING THE GROWTH OF THE SOUL*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

T WAS in B.C. 1729 that Joseph's brothers were filled with envy, and sold him as a slave to the Midianites going down to Egypt. Envy had destroyed all of their brotherly kindness, and made them cruel, even bloodrsty. Now it was B.C. 1707. Between those two dates great change had come over the brothers of Joseph. ey were changed during that interim from bitter speak-, lying men into kindly speaking, praying men. How d it all come about? Partly from love of their father cob, for bad as they were they did not lose all of their al feeling. There was still a spark of brotherliness in ir hearts, for they loved their kid brother, Benjamin. Sometimes when a fire burns low, and only a spark is t, it is possible to fan that spark into a flame. And so it s with the ten sons of Jacob: the little love they had t in their hearts was fanned by lack of food, by adrsity, by fear, by sorrow, by remorse, into a wonrful flame of love. The story of it all is so familiar, it es not need to be given here. If we would see the soulowth in the hearts of the brothers we must compare iat they said about Joseph when they were about to sell n, with what they said about Benjamin when he was ought as a culprit before the Egyptian ruler:

B.C. 1729

Come now, therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit, d we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him; and we shall see at will become of his dreams.—Gen. 37: 20.

B.C. 1707

t shall come to pass when he (Jacob, our father) seeth that the lad not with us, that he will die, and thy servants shall bring down the y hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave.—Gen. : 31.

Joseph recognized that all bitterness and envy had gone t of their hearts, and lovingkindness had entered. We ed have little doubt that Joseph's servant had reported e open, honest attitude of the sons of Jacob when they ere overtaken on the road—"How then should we steal t of thy lord's house?"—and the pledge backed by a e and the liberty of all. Joseph knew of the grief for e younger brother that they had symbolized in the rendg of their clothes. Can we not realize the surging emoons that he hid behind a passive face as Judah, the okesman for the brothers, addressed him: "Now therere when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be ot with us, . . . he will die; and thy servants shall ring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with rrow to the grave. . . . Now therefore, I pray thee, t thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to y lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. For how hall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me?"

There was in these words a tenderness for the aged ather and a spirit of self-sacrifice of which in those days e world knew little. And what a sermon the last senence quoted should be to all who are working for the salation of the youth of America! We cannot shirk the esponsibility that those words should have for us in this odern day. How shall we, any of us, go up to our father nd the lads be not with us?

Joseph had tested his brothers, and they had stood the esting. They had been tried in the furnace and been reined so that they reflected the image of God, as men may. He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver, and he shall urify the sons of Levi [and all sons] and purge them as old and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offerng in righteousness." (Mal. 3: 3.) Joseph had himself een "purged," so that men have dared to speak of him as "type of Christ," as "the fruitful bough," even as Christ s called "the Branch" and "the True Vine." The Joseph who tested his brothers when he had become the ruler of Egypt was certainly a very different character from the boy who told rather boastfully the visions of his greatness.

Let none of us overlook ourselves in this matter. We must believe that God desires that we shall be purified and purged of all evil. This will cause us to view in the right light the disappointments, the losses, the crosses, the afflictions that come to us. One day a gentleman sat at the window watching a pair of pigeons exercising their young ones on a perch. He says: "The birdlings had grown to almost full size, but they have been brought out of the cote for the first time this sunny morning. There is a good deal of cooing and chaffing between the father and mother. She says, 'It will never do.' He ruffles his feathers and says, 'It is high time.' She runs back through the little window and coaxes them to follow her. Then she pushes one of them off the shelf. It flounders a little, catches itself, and finally lights safely on the ground. The mother is down there in a minute, pitying and comforting and withal very proud. And the father takes that opportunity to push the other one off. And now they have a nice time, trying short flights up again." And the gentleman who was observing the pigeons moralized thus: "You have been growing in grace, and now the time has come to fly. You do not know how, and so you think divine grace is withdrawn. Step off. Trust God. You will find this one supreme confidence will strengthen your faith immensely. By one resistance of evil Joseph attained a steadier growth in grace than years of obedience without trial would have yielded. Grace for trials and responsibilities is not always a slow growth. It is often a sudden endowment."—Wolcott Calkins.

The same writer again says: "When I want to fill my soul with confidence in the present and almighty power of my Saviour I pick out a Christian man whom I knew before he was converted to have a covetous disposition. I wait till he has an opportunity to double his investments by overreaching a neighbor. I see him resist the temptation and work by the Golden Rule. There is growth in grace for you! Then I find one who used to be jealous and envious. A rumor is started to the discredit of a neighbor. I remember how such a story used to leap from her lips like wildfire, and inflame the neighborhood with slanderous gossip. Now the evil tidings are buried in silence. When this becomes impossible, she is the faithful friend to go and speak alone with the sufferer, never opening her lips to another. There is growth in grace for you! I find another Christian who had an ungovernable temper before conversion. A day comes when for sixteen successive hours she is incessantly plied with harassing, provoking cares. There is a little outburst of impatience at last, but she is sorry a moment after. I know there must have been a struggle for months and years to make her so patient and cheerful that day. And I praise God for this miraculous growth in grace."

But there are some Christians who do not grow this way, and those whose right and whose duty it is to attain unto the measure of the fulness of the stature of Christ (Eph. 4: 13) are so stunted as to be mere pigmies in grace!

We may learn from the beautiful magnolia tree an impressive lesson about growth. It is a tree that is never without leaves—until it is dead. It is green when others are leafless. As the spring advances, the new leaves appear, and at the same time the old ones drop off, and lying on the ground they form a strange contrast to the new. So our corruptions are best removed by the growth of new graces. Soon the beautiful white blossoms with their sweet fragrance appear among the fresh green leaves, typifying the white life of the Christian sending forth blessing upon all who pass.

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, June 1, 913. Joseph Tests His Brethren. Gen. 44: 4-17. GOLDEN TEXT: "Confess therefore your sins one to another, and pray for one another, that e may be healed." James 5: 16, R.V.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—"WHAT IS THE BEST method by which to get a correct enrolment of the Sunday school? We want to revise our roll because we feel that there are some members not entitled to enrolment, but we don't know just where to draw the line. When, in your judgment, should a member be dropped from the roll?"—E. E. Blint, Leechburg, Pa.

Appoint a rally day for the express purpose of making a new enrolment. Announce that only those who attend the rally day services, or send a notice, either written or verbal, explaining their absence, will be put on the new roll. Afterward keep the roll "alive" by cutting off the names at the end of each quarter of those who have failed to attend during that time. Such persons, however, should have had at least two visits in their homes, if not three, from the superintendent or teacher. Such a course as this would certainly prevent scholars from drifting away from the Sunday school.

—"HOW CAN I BRING about a teachers' revival?"—J. C. M., Indianapolis.

We are quite at a loss to know exactly what you mean by a "teachers' revival," but we will answer it as an all-around question. We take it for granted that teachers are not in need of a revival of religion, and yet we believe that Sunday school teachers should be made the subjects of special prayer, private and public, by the church whose children they are instructing. The pastor should himself feel much concern for teachers, and endeavor in an unobtrusive way to put helpful books and papers in their hands, and should be on terms of special friendliness with them.

A revival of teaching interest could best be brought about by having a teachers' mission conducted for three months during the hour preceding the prayer-meeting, when up-to-date methods should be presented. The superintendent should be the leader in this matter, and he should call to his assistance some expert institute workers if possible. But if he cannot do this, let him prepare himself for it by sending to the International Sunday School Association, Mallers' Building, Chicago, for a set of Teachers' Training leaflets (not forgetting to enclose a two-cent stamp for postage). And when he has secured these, let him mark out a course of instruction to give his teachers. In some Sunday schools a teachers' meeting is regularly held fifteen minutes before the opening of the school. What an uplift such a plan provides in a sympathetic word from the superintendent, also a wise teaching hint uttered in two or three sentences, and earnest prayers from the teachers themselves for each other, and for the scholars they are about to teach and influence for eternity.

There might well be a teachers' social revival, a meeting to be held twice a year, or once a quarter, for certainly those who are engaged in the same blessed work should be well acquainted with each other in order to bring about the best results.

—SOME TEACHING HINTS.—Accidental should not be confounded with intentional wrongdoing; bad pupils need most sympathy; confidence in pupils makes them trustworthy; decision is necessary in securing good discipline; emotional natures may be made too sensitive; the fatigue point should not be passed; growth comes from repeated acts; hypocrisy is caused by stimulating precocious goodness; inattention is worse than inability; knowledge should be fixed by being used; listening is not a very developing exercise; manners are an important part of moral training; noisy teachers make noisy pupils; obedience is a clear duty; parents and teachers should work in harmony; questioning in rotation is wrong; repression of activity is not true discipline; suggestions are better than commands; telling is not true teaching; uniformity in movement is desirable; variety promotes mental and physical vigor; will is trained by acts; young children cannot study hard.—James L. Hughes.

THE SEARCH FOR HAPPINESS

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

A RICH girl, who, so everybody says, should be happy, left her home and ran away. She was found in a day or two and brought back, sorry and repentant, but with very firm convictions. When a reporter, one of those gimlet-eyed, question-asking gentlemen that we read of, asked her why she left her home, she told him that she was in search of happiness.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

I quote her words from one of the daily papers:

"People say that I am rich, but that does not mean that I am happy. Daughters of rich people are not always happy. I didn't have anything but money; I couldn't buy happiness with that. It didn't do me any good except to buy fine clothes. I wanted love. I wanted a home. If I ever run away again it will be to elope!"

Oh, girls! when you see the ones "who toil not" rolling by in their luxurious cars, and when you feel the tiniest bit of envy tug at your heart strings, remember this girl who had everything money could buy and feel sorry for her.

I am going to tell you about a very sad contrast that I saw the other day as I was walking down a city street. A funeral was passing by; one of those elaborate funerals with wagons full of flowers and a string of carriages that reached perhaps two blocks. In the first carriage sat three ladies, robed in elaborate mourning garb of crêpe and silk. Two were hard-faced, cold-looking women, who stared haughtily over the heads of the crowd, but the third, a pretty, blond, doll-like little person, smiled as her dark-lashed eyes swept the throng. She seemed to be enjoying her small distinction very much.

I had hardly walked half a block when another funeral crept down a side street. It was a very unpretentious affair, and only one clumsy home-made wreath of spring blossoms gave a touch of color and light. A single carriage followed the hearse, and as it passed I saw shrinking back into the dim corner of the seat a young woman dressed in a faded black cotton dress. She was very pale, but her eyes had red rings around them that told of long weeping, and her thin arms clasped a tiny baby close to her heart.

As I brushed my hands across my eyes I seemed to see the other shining procession placed beside this one. And then I fell to moralizing, a habit one acquires in the city. I thought that the man, the rich man, had not been able to buy happiness, but that the poor man going shabbily to his last resting-place had been able, with all his poverty, to buy love.

I once read a story by a very idealistic modern author. It was the reconstructed story of King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid. Tennyson says:

> In robe and crown the king stepped down,
> To meet and greet her on her way.

But he never told us just what the beggar maid thought.

Now, in the story that I read, the beggar maid became queen, and for a little while she enjoyed herself. She was fêted and praised. Great gifts were showered upon her, and she was dressed in satin and silk. But after a while the queen tired of her royal life, of the pomp and ceremony, of the exquisite clothes and wonderful jewels. Then one day when the king and his court were hunting, the wanderlust caught her, so she laid her rich apparel in a cedar chest, and donned the ragged gipsy dress in which the king had first won her. And with a last lingering look at the things that money could buy, she left the palace for the free, happy life that she loved.

The story had a great charm for me because it was so well written, but I wondered how many of us would have had the courage to follow the beggar maid's example. How many of us, if the choice were ours, would cast our lot in the paths of humble happiness? The glitter of wealth is an attraction not to be scoffed at, for if the heart be right it can add new worlds of travel and music and education and beauty to our enjoyment. Yet alone it is nothing.

I know another story that I am going to tell you while I am in the story-telling mood. This one is about the lord of a great estate, whose wide acres gave all that his heart could desire of this world's goods. His splendid manor house was a home of luxury and ease, though not of contentment. So its master went in search of happiness. The elusive little sprite seemed to hover always just out of his reach; teasing, alluring, but unattainable. And the lord of the manor became pale and wan for the want of it. He traveled to distant lands and cities over seas and mountains, and through forests. He tasted all the pleasures of the cities and the wilds. He spent lavishly only to find that his money could not buy happiness.

At last he returned, weary and dissatisfied; and as he crossed a field by his old home he saw a man plowing. He watched the work for a moment, and suddenly a longing gripped him to walk through the soft earth, his own land, with the handles in his hands. So he took the plow and started. It was a warm day, and as he reached the end of the furrow he began to feel tired; but when he looked over his shoulder at the fresh furrow his plow had cut, he felt strangely contented. His heart leaped forward with his task and he hardly knew when the end had been reached. Then a strange thing happened. For the king heard a light little laugh, and looking down he saw Happiness perched on the handle of the plow, within reach of his hand.

There is a fine little moral that sticks out at the end of this story.

I know that some within our own little circle are discontented and unhappy, because, oh, so many have told me "all about it" in letters that were blue as indigo. And yet, perhaps, if you searched you would find happiness right at your own door in your own home. Maybe there is a burden that can be lightened by a cheerful smile or a bit of good advice, or a tiny little effort from a helping hand. And you will be surprised to find how much nearer Happiness will seem if you will only realize that it is not in the great world of glitter and bustle that the fairy sprite is found.

You remember the old saying, "Money is the root of all evil." Let us keep always beside it this other sentence: "Love is the beginning of all happiness."

Put a little love into your most homely tasks; smile at the little cripple boy that you meet in the street car and bite your lips hard when you want to say an unkind word.

Don't try to chase a happiness that glitters and shines like a bubble in the sunshine; do your best at helping and comforting and loving, and then you will find Happiness at your finger tips and smiling.

> Don't cry for the wealth of Midas;
> He suffered his share of pain;
> Don't think that all joy is money,
> In a glittering, golden rain.
> For a thankful smile is a blessing
> More precious than gold can buy;
> And happiness goes to the one who knows
> That God is enthroned on high.

THE VALLEY AND THE VISITOR

BY MRS. A. R. STARK

AS EVENING deepens mists soften the forbidding harshness of the foothills of the Andes, and for a short time the last rays of sunshine clothe them in brilliant garments, changing rapidly from transparent, gleaming gold to rose, pink, and yellow, then to the violet tones of violet and pearly gray. San Cristobal Hill stands out, bold and clear, above valley and river, keeping watch over Peru's proud capital, Lima, "the City of the Kings." A large cross on its summit is overshadowed by a gigantic "wireless" tower, destined to send messages across the heights 17,000 feet above sea-level, to towns and peoples in the far interior of Peru. The cross tells city and valley the supreme message of the world's Redeemer, and speaks to us of the power of a perfect love. The "wireless" shows us the marvelous forces of nature captured and adapted to man's use. Both draw their power from above—a power that we may hold and use, but cannot understand.

A group of women are carefully making their way down San Cristobal's winding footpath, returning from the steep climb up to the cross. Down the perilous south side belated "wireless" workmen make their way, clinging to any uneven surface they can find as they slip and slide down the shaled rocks to gain sure footing on the pathway beneath.

Below, the river Rimac waters estates where cotton, sugar-cane, fruit-trees and vegetables grow. Vines trail over rustic supports, where clusters of grapes hang in rich profusion. Olive groves and palta-trees, oranges and lemons, pomegranates and grenadiers, blossoming shrubs and the stately magnolia owe their very life to the river's generous supply.

Yonder is a pretty village with flat-roofed houses, the main road shaded by an avenue of dark-leaved trees that frame a glimpse of white surf breaking over rocks in the sparkling Pacific. Field-laborers live in the whitewashed huts on the outskirts of the village. In their gardens vines trail over rough trellis, shade the wells, and hens take their earth-baths under the laden fig-trees.

Women are cooking their evening meal on braseros outside the walls of their huts and children run to and fro scattering corn for the hens or playing together. Against one open door a little sunburnt girl is standing, her scant blue frock, rent at the shoulder, scarcely covering her pretty rounded limbs. The child's dark eyes rest unheeding on everything around as she watches for her father's return. Close by are large fields of broom-cane partly cut to-day, and Anita hears unheeding the creaking noise of the stiff cane-stalks as they sway unwillingly in the light breeze, and the squeal of the fieldmouse as it hunts for its lost nest.

Along the road two men are slowly wending their way. "Who comes with thy father, my child?" asks the mother, leaving the cazuela (soup) she is cooking and joining her child by the rough wall of sun-dried bricks.

"Yonder comes a señor with my father, but they are as yet too far distant for me to tell who it is." And shading her eyes with a little brown hand, she looks intently down the long road.

Bending slowly forward she screws her bare toes deep down in the loose dust. Suddenly, springing up by a gap in the broad wall, she claps her hands and calls out excitedly:

"Mamma, mamma, he who comes with my father is the seller of sacred books! Shall I hasten in and put another plate with that of my father on the table?" and without awaiting her mother's answer she runs into the unfloored room to make ready for the guest.

"I have brought with me our good friend who last week told us so many cosas interesantes [interesting things] from his books," said the laborer as he came up to the door.

"He has arrived at a good time," and the mother stowed her baby away in a swinging hammock over the bed and turned to bring in the brown earthen pot full of savory steaming stew.

"Nay, but I must not stay this night," said the man with the bag of books. "I have walked far to-day, and see, the sun now dies. I must return to my home. Anita, la señora, my wife, has for thee a little book. To-morrow thou mayst ask thy mother's permission to come and visit her, and if thou canst read the little book it shall be thine."

"A thousand thanks," said the child. "I know not how to read. Would the señora teach me? And the book, does it contain beautiful stories like those we heard last time you came?"

"It contains those and many others, all stories of the Saviour's life and death, and of his love that dies not. Come, that thou mayst learn to read them. Adios, dear child; may God's blessing be with thee."

"Señor," says the laborer as he warmly embraces the departing Bible-man—"señor, this humble house with all it contains is yours whenever you will honor it by your presence. May God bless you."

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

The modern investigations of the relation of growth to health among children have developed some points that may be suggestive in their spiritual upbringing as well. A writer in the Westminster Review says: "With regard to the standard of weight for growing children, that usually given by authorities in the matter is that at five years of age a child should weigh about as many pounds as it is inches high. As a rule this will not be much or more than forty pounds. A deficiency of weight, especially during the continuance of growth, is always an unfavorable sign. Any interruption in the progress of increase of weight, especially during the continuance of growth, must be a danger signal that should not be neglected. . . . To be under the normal weight is to be especially liable to contract the infectious diseases, for the resistive vitality is considerably lower than normal. The scale then will have to be considered an instrument of precision for diagnosis, and especially for prognosis, in the obscure conditions that so often occur in growing children." All of which is highly suggestive to those who are dealing with the growth of children in soul life. We read in the Bible that the child Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man (Luke 2: 52). "Even a child is known by his doings, whether his work be pure, and whether it be right" (Prov. 20: 11). All parents and teachers should endeavor to keep the children up to the Christ standard. This oversight should be none the less exercised when the children are under the stress of school life. If they are early strengthened in Christ it will help them to grow both in soul and body.

PRAY FOR ONE ANOTHER

More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of. Wherefore let thy voice
Rise like a fountain for me night and day.
For what are men better than sheep or goats,
That nourish a blind life within the brain,
If knowing God, they lift not hands of prayer.
Both for themselves and those who call them friends?

For 51 years we have worked to create a superlative dish—to make these kitchens famous.

We have searched for the ablest chefs. Skill, time and cost have been lavished on this dish. All to insure that those who bought it got the utmost in baked beans.

The beans we use—picked out by hand—cost three times what some beans cost.

The tomato sauce costs five times what lesser sauce would cost.

The baking is done with super-heated steam, kept from contact with the beans. Thus the beans are baked in high heat for hours, and baked without crisping, without bursting the beans.

Van Camp's come to you nut-like, mealy and whole, yet easy to digest. And they come with the fresh oven flavor.

This dish is our pride, our one claim to supremacy. It has brought us nation-wide fame.

shot out in the open, and fell down there wounded between the two forces. Your father—he was nothing but a boy, only nineteen—he jumped over the rank in front of him and ran out under the fire from both lines and picked the man up in his arms and ran back with him, and the Johnnies and our boys they all stopped shooting and cheered him. I reckon that was a pretty fine thing for him to do, but he would never listen afterwards when any one told of it—said he disremembered anything of the kind. There wasn't a bit of foolhardiness in him; it was just clear, simple courage, and he had it all through his life. When my boy died of scarlet fever he helped me carry the little coffin out of the house when no one else would come near us—and he'd never had the scarlet fever himself.

"I guess there's more things like this to tell than anybody'll ever rightly know. When he had burdens to bear, he never laid them on other people; he just helped carry theirs; there's a look that comes on some people's faces even now, when they speak his name, that's a greater testimonial than any monument could be.

"But I want him to have the stone too. I told Captain Finch I wanted them to beat the long roll on the drums at the grave; your father, he loved the drums more than most any one I ever knew—he said he always felt like he was called to march when he heard them. There were some words he used to be fond of singing—I don't know where he got them—to the tune of 'The Girl I Left Behind Me.'

"I march to the call of the drum, drum, drum,
To the beat of the drum march I;
I'll take my place on the firing line,
And with face to the front I'll die!

"I'd like to have told you all this, but I'm not much at talking: I seem to get at what I want to say better when I'm by myself. I don't go all the lengths of the Japanese about their ancestors, but I reckon I'm Japanesy enough to feel that we let something go out of our lives that we can't get back in any other way when we forget how they've lived, and what they've done. I'm not belittling any of your mother's people; but it's because you're your father's daughter that I write this to you now, and I want you should be proud that you're his girl.

"With my deep respects to your mother, I am,

"Your affectionate and true cousin,
"RUFUS GARLAND."

"Well, the mortgage is settled for a while, at any rate," said Mrs. Garland with a sigh of relief, after a moment's thoughtful silence. "I wouldn't have you think, Elizabeth, that I'm not glad to have your dear father's memory honored. Of course it's only right and proper, but I'm sure he would a great deal rather go without a tombstone when you need so many things! There's the sweetest muslin at Green's that I've been longing to buy for you—it's only ten cents a yard—a mere nothing, and yet—"

"Oh, mother, mother dear, never mind about me now," said Elizabeth. She ran hastily out in the garden and sat down on the bench under the grape arbor with its budding vines. She wanted to be alone—to think. There was a big world—not far off, but here—that she had never known. The call of the drums! So that was why they had always stirred her so strangely. She heard them now beating down in the village, and her young heart suddenly beat to match them exultingly, her young hands clenched as if to hold their message in the soft clasp. Suppose it was a call not to run from, but to follow! Something seemed struggling to free itself that had been imprisoned in her bosom for a long, long time. If you could get to the place where you would never be ashamed of doing what was right—if you could get to that place—

"I beg your pardon. I didn't know that there was any one here."

The carrier of the water pail stood before her, hat in hand. "I came with Captain Finch, who is making some arrangements with Mrs. Garland about her husband's monument, and I took the liberty of straying into this lovely old-fashioned garden." He turned as if to leave.

"Oh, please don't go; please sit down, won't you?" She had forgotten to blush or look conscious as she usually did in the presence of a strange young man. Instead, she moved to make a place beside her under the budding grape-vine; her tremulous smile seemed a part of both the sunlight and the shadow that wavered around her. "I'm Elizabeth Garland; you're Mr. Dare, aren't you?"

"Why, yes," said the young man taking the seat with an instant courteousness that showed no surprise, however much he may have felt.

"I heard some friends of mine speak of you. They said that you had your own way—that you had had a hard fight for it! I remember the very words." Her color changed a little, but she went on: "Do you know, I was thinking just now, before you came, about meeting you this morning, and wishing to see you again; it's just a fancy, but I wanted to ask you something just because you were a stranger and would tell me the truth without caring why I wanted to know. Perhaps, though, you'll think me very odd."

"No, no! Ask anything." His gray eyes earnestly responded to her confidence.

"Well, then! Did you ever do anything that was very, very difficult—that you felt beforehand that you couldn't possibly do?"

His fine smile brought cheering assent.

"Yes, many times."

"And was it as hard as you thought it would be? There's something I may have to do—it seems very hard, and I'd like to know. My father was very brave, and I ought to be. Is it as hard afterwards?"

He considered. "Yes, harder, in some ways, perhaps; not so hard in others that one hasn't thought of. I can't explain except to say that bad as a thing may be to stand, you get to feel that nothing is so bad as shirking it; you find that hurts you worse than anything afterwards."

Her deeply questioning gaze seemed to compel him to further confidences. "Indeed, indeed I know! My father died when I was fourteen and there were four younger than I. We hadn't a cent."

"What did you do?"

"I picked over rags in a factory—it wasn't pretty work." His smile dwelt on her with something tenderly, finely stimulating in it. "That wasn't for very long though. I got up a little higher in a couple of months; then I studied nights, and got up a little higher yet, and so on. By and by when I understood more about the machinery, I invented something."

Elizabeth drew a long breath. "Didn't you mind that you couldn't do things like other boys—didn't you ever get discouraged?"

"Often."

"But you kept right on all the time?"

"Yes. You mustn't speak as if I'd stopped." He unconsciously braced his shoulders as he spoke. "I'm putting the boys through college now. There is Captain Finch standing on the porch with your mother, and I have to leave on the next train."

"Oh, I'm so sorry you have to go!" She placed her hand in his cordial grasp. "Thank you for telling me. Thank you so much!"

"When I'm here again in the fall may I come and see how it goes with you? I can understand a little, although I don't ask." His tone had the simple directness of hers. Heaven only knows how fragile and sweet and helpless she looked to him, and how much he suddenly longed to carry all her burdens for her, but he only held her hand a little more firmly as he continued:

"I would say I am sorry for you—only one never, never knows; perhaps it is all a part of something that will make you very glad some day."

"Yes, oh yes! I'm glad now." She stood and looked after him as he went out the gate, and laid the hand he had pressed against her cheek, to feel the thrill of it, as she was to hold it there for comfort many a time in day or night to come.

The Day of Memorial came with its full tide of remembrance of the noble dead. Elizabeth in her white gown stood with her mother on the green sward under the flag that waved to the blue, blue sky, while the unpretentious monument was unveiled, and good old Captain Finch, gray-bearded and tremulous, yet on this one day erect and soldierly with the spirit of the past, read the brief and simple record of one unknown hero to the little group that crowded around the veterans.

"At the siege of Vicksburg—"

Oh, a deed of courage never dies! At the mere mention it springs into life once more; at the mere mention of it something strangely sweet, strangely quickening, stirs the blood, helping us to do our own lowly duty, no matter how differing, how slight.

The parting shots were fired in a late salute. "Taps" were flown that told of sleep and rest, and then that long roll of the drum that called for action still!

And this was not Elizabeth, timid and shrinking, ashamed of her clothes and of her poverty, clinging for the sake of gentlehood to the submission of decay, who walked to the factory in the early light on Monday morning. This was Elizabeth, the daughter of a soldier, brave to march with the great Army of Toilers who must fight for the lives of those they love. She did not see Miss Minnie's quick, satisfied glance down from behind her window blinds, though the glance had a blessing in it, but there was all the comradeship of the enlisted with the crowd who went beside her through the gate; yes, and with Howard Dare, who was "on the firing line" too; hadn't he begun by sorting rags?

Her light step smote the pavement with the suggestion of a martial ring in it as she kept time unconsciously to the unheard beat of the rallying drums.

AMONG THE WORKERS

—THE REV. SEDWICK W. BIDWELL, of Middlebury, Vt., recently celebrated his one hundred and third birthday. For nearly eighty years he has been a preacher of the Gospel. He has retained his faculties to a remarkable degree and his physique is well preserved. His wonderful memory goes back three generations, and he can relate incidents of the battle of Plattsburg. Five years ago he was asked to preach at the Methodist church at East Middlebury, and did so with great vigor before a large congregation. During the past summer he read a letter without the aid of glasses. A grateful reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD recalls two sermons preached by Mr. Bidwell in 1855, which led to her conversion. He performed the wedding ceremony for about 500 couples, and the same correspondent states that she has never known one of the many couples married by Mr. Bidwell to separate.

—THE SECRETARY of a Soldiers' Aid Society sends some interesting information about the life and work of the Rev. John W. Lindsay, D.D., who died at Clifton Springs Sanitarium recently, in the ninety-third year of his age. Just before the Civil War, Mr. Lindsay came from Wesleyan University to the pastorate of the Chelsea M. E. Church, New York City. Under his care the church rapidly increased in membership and prosperity. Although he did not resign his pastorate when the war broke out, he visited the battlefields and the hospitals at the front, looking after his parishioners who were in the army and comforting and cheering other soldiers. His simple Christian life won the hearts of all. During war times his Sunday school superintendent and wife, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. North, looked after the families of the men who had gone to war. Later Dr. Lindsay was the pastor of the Eighteenth Street and Bedford Street M. E. Churches. He remained in the active ministry until 1909.

—THE REV. G. N. THOMSSEN writes from Bapatla, India, about one of the Bible workers in that country who recently died: "Her name, Guddala Sarahmah, does not mean anything to the public in general, yet she was the man and woman of the family, for her husband is only a poor stick of a man, too brittle to lean upon. This woman, under circumstances that would have appalled most people, has brought up a model family. Her daughter is a noble wife. The eldest son is intelligent, and ambitious in every good work. The second son is a successful teacher. The youngest son bids fair to excel all in manly virtues. Sarahmah was every one's friend. Though only a poor outcaste Christian woman, Brahmans and Chetties and Sudras all honored her. She seemed to know that her end was near, for she settled all her affairs, even arranging for the marriage of her youngest son, and then she said: 'An angel came and told me that I am to go to heaven to-day. Oh, the joy of dying!' There was lamentation in the village when the news spread: 'Sarahmah is dead!' All gathered at her humble home in the hamlet. The body was wrapped in new clean cloths; the bier was decked with flowers, and the burial was almost like a bridal procession—but for the mourners. The body was reverently lowered into its narrow bed decked with flowers and then covered with the soil. But no rude shovel rattled the clods upon the coffin. Loving hands, little by little, filled the grave by solemnly, tearfully, gratefully dropping dust upon the dust below. Even Brahmans came and deposited a handful of earth upon the remains of that poor outcaste woman."

CALLED HIGHER

Mrs. Sarah Caroline Pettengill, of Amesbury, Mass., was called higher January 2, 1913, at the age of 82 years.

Mrs. Jane Pettigrew (83), of Everett, Pa., passed away March 17, 1913. She was a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

James Edward Ellery died at his home in Titusville, Pa., February 25, 1913, at the age of 72 years. He was a member of the Methodist Church.

Mrs. Mercy P. Smith (69), of Five Islands, Canada, was called higher March 24, 1913. She was a member of the Five Islands Church for about 55 years.

John W. Sill, a respected citizen of Lyndonville, N. Y., died on March 6, 1913, at the age of 78 years. He was a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mrs. Mary E. Peterson (60), of Jamestown, Kan., passed away March 19, 1913. She was a faithful Christian, a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for many years.

Mr. Albert E. Lewis, of Newton, N. H., passed to the home above March 21, 1913, at the age of 44 years. He was a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for many years.

Mrs. Mary B. Hodges, of Great Neck, N. Y., passed beyond into a higher life March 14, 1913, in the ninety-sixth year of her life. She had been a member of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Family for the last twenty years.

Thomas P. Hayward, of Marlboro, N. J., was called higher February 26, 1913, at the age of eighty-two years. He was a life-long member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mrs. Hannah Jenkins Hillman, of Greely County, Neb., passed from this life January 13, 1913, at the age of 82 years. As the wife of a Methodist clergyman she devoted her life to the service of her Master.

A beautiful coincidence is portrayed in the lives and deaths of S. P. Kindle and Thomas J. Brown, of Waynesville, Ohio. Mr. Brown was born August 16, 1833, and Mr. Kindle, August 23 of the same year. Living within a short distance of each other, they became brothers-in-law and fast friends almost two-score years ago. Both were Christian gentlemen of the noblest type. Their lives on earth ended within twenty-three hours of each other on April 2, 1913, and their bodies were laid to rest in the Miami Cemetery within the same half hour. For many years they had been most appreciative readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Safety — First and Foremost

THE thoroughly conservative and prudent investor considers safety first of all and satisfies himself that an investment is sound and thoroughly safeguarded before he even considers any of its other features. Too many investors, especially under present conditions, think of the interest return first and of safety second, a policy which experience has shown to be unwise.

To investors seeking assured safety, whether their funds be large or small, we recommend directly secured by absolute first liens on the highest class of newly improved, income-producing, centrally-located Chicago real estate, maturing serially in two to ten years, issued in denominations of $100, $500, $1,000 and $5,000.

FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS

5½ to 6%

We emphasize the safety of these bonds rather than the attractive interest rate they bear. Their soundness is best shown by the fact that no investor has ever lost a dollar of principal or interest on any security purchased of us since this House was founded, thirty-one years ago.

DEPARTMENT OF INVESTMENT COUNSEL

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD does not in any way guarantee investment advertisements. It is impossible to do so, because our subscribers have far more money to invest than our total capital would permit us to refund. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Also, any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable; but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

ANSWERS TO FINANCIAL QUERIES

J. R. C. M., MANITOBA. The latest quotation for Northwestern Asbestos stock is one-half cent a share. It is understood that the company is to be reorganized, other men put in as officers, and the capital stock reduced from $20,000,000 to $8,000,000. The promotors have been scored for the way they sold the stock.

G. H. G., PENNSYLVANIA. I am unable at present to report on the Los Angeles Investment Company, but have sent for statement. The company is supposed to be successful.

B. H., OKLAHOMA. The realty company with which you have invested is not a very large concern and operates in real estate outside the city lines. This department has never favored the methods pursued by the concern in attracting investors nor in the plan of operation. One redeemable feature is, investors are permitted to withdraw money after a certain date—after payments have been made for three years, I believe. This being so, you should ask for a return of your money.

J. F. R., NEW YORK. Neither New York Central nor Southern Pacific is recommended. At present prices, the yield of the former stock is too small for a speculative investment, and, while the return from the stock of S. P. is more liberal, there is too much uncertainty as to the results from the forced dissolution of the Southern and Union Pacifics. No one knows how the break will affect either company. At 99 Baltimore & Ohio offers a better opportunity for a speculative investment. Your $1,000 will secure ten shares, and pay the broker's commission and tax. Don't, however, buy any railway stock, unless you fully realize the speculative nature of the security and are able to assume the risk that must always be present.

REV. C. V. M., NEW YORK. That you do not see the advertising of the company in question in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, though it formerly was given a place in our advertising columns, in no ways reflects on the solvency of the concern. We were compelled to ask the company to withdraw its patronage because it did not measure up to certain definite standards, which all financial advertisers must meet if they secure admission to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. I do not believe you will lose a cent through the company, but to assure the safety which should be yours I suggest that you ask for a refund, and when you have secured your money invest it in some of the securities that are now advertised in our financial department, provided they meet with your approval.

REV. D. C. B., NEW JERSEY. A Presbyterian clergyman from your own State came into our office recently and stated that he desired to invest $8,000, and he wanted to secure our advice. We gave him names of a number of banking firms and suggested a line of securities which, in our judgment, would be sound and profitable investments. Our friend visited a number of firms and finally bought the following:

City of Tacoma (Wash.) 5s.
Fonda, Johnstown & Gloversville 4½s.
City of Westwood (N. J.) 5s.
Cuban Government 5s.
Chicago & Eastern Illinois 5s.
Cumberland County Power & Light 5s.
Chicago, M. & St. P. General Mort. 4½s.

Our friend will not lose sleep over his investments. These bonds are well secured, the yield is as liberal as one should expect and he can get his money quickly if he should require it. I recommend this class of investment to you, if possible visit our office and consult the financial editor before making any move.

E. J. W., PENNSYLVANIA. You ask about the following securities:

(1) Manufactures Light & Heat 5s.
(2) American Water Works & Guarantee Co. Cum. Participating Preferred Stock.
(3) West Penn. Traction Bonds.
(4) Great Shoshone & Twin Falls Water Power Co. Bonds.

Nos. 2, 3, and 4 are backed by a firm regarded as more than ordinarily successful in their undertakings and the securities are attractive. They are traded in on the Pittsburg Stock Exchange.

S. W. P., CONNECTICUT. The Federal Crate & Basket Co. was organized a number of years ago to take over the business of the Mergenthaler-Horton Basket Co. whose big basket making plant at Paducah, Ky., had proved to be a failure. Considerable additional capital was put into the new company and the two or three hundred basket machines were started up again. So far as I know nothing came from the second attempt. The trouble lay, partly, in the machines. They wasted an appalling amount of veneer, the raw material from which the berry baskets are made. But the principal trouble with the original company was the waste of stockholders' money by the promoters, principally Charles R. Barlow, who disappeared just before the company went to smash, and has never been apprehended. Your stock is of no value.

S. M. H., ALABAMA. I think well of the first mortgages offered by the Chicago firm. Apparently every possible safeguard has been resorted to that investors may be protected. The firm back of the mortgages make it their custom to re-purchase the notes on demand. This feature of marketability makes the investment additionally attractive.

MISS O. M. G., MISSISSIPPI. There is no reason why you should send your money to the Georgia Savings Bank. The rate of interest offered is not sufficiently liberal to offset the risk, but it is too high for any bank to pay on demand deposits. Buy a good $1,000 railway or public service corporation bond, or ten $100 bonds. These may be secured to return an average yield of from five to five and one-half per cent., and your principal will be instantly convertible into cash. The great investment firms, some of whom advertise in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, offer splendid facilities to small investors to acquire ownership of sound securities. I remember no time in many years when good bonds and stocks could be bought at such attractive prices.

W. E. C., CALIFORNIA. (1) Industrial Savings & Loan claimholders will probably be paid a ten per cent. dividend in August is the information given at the office of Mr. Benjamin D. Haight, deputy superintendent of the Banking Department of the State of New York. This instalment dividend, when paid, will be most welcome to the thousands of investors in the Industrial.

MRS. W. R., MASSACHUSETTS. You state that you have a little money to invest and ask about American Telegraph and Telephone Co. and the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. You specify the stock issues. I do not recommend either for a woman's investment. You can secure nothing better in the way of investment, however, than the American Telegraph & Telephone Co. bonds and the bonds of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad.

MISS A. P., NORTH CAROLINA. The real estate company mentioned in your letter of the 21st is run by a man whom I believe to have honest intentions, but unfortunately is possessed of a prophetic view of profits from real estate speculation that ordinary mortals do not have. It is all right to figure out such wonderful profits from real estate speculations when you are engaged in fooling yourself, but when it comes to fooling others it is another matter. I do not believe the company will ever realize such profits. Are you given any assurance of a withdrawal privilege? If you are, I should take advantage of it before it is too late.

L. C. T., OREGON. You ask how you may invest your money so that the principal will go to foreign missions at your decease and the interest come to you during your lifetime. Write to Mr. F. M. Bruselman, the Presbyterian Board of Publication, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

J. E. W., IOWA. You need have no fear regarding the safety of your investment in the Dayton Power & Light 1st and refunding 5s. Advices from the company say that the properties have been restored to normal conditions and that all flood damage has been repaired. Total loss to the physical property is said to have been under $25,000, although the loss due to interruption of service was larger. Within forty-eight hours after the floods had subsided a large part of the city was being served with gas. It is said that 85 per cent. of the Industries of Dayton are dependent on the Dayton Power & Light Co.

Buy Bonds

Good bonds have all the elements of security of real estate mortgages. They are fractional parts of carefully drawn mortgages on improved and productive property and, in addition, are backed by the credit of prosperous business enterprises. They are readily salable at all times, and the interest can be collected at any bank by presenting the coupons as they become due. Long-term bonds assure permanent investment of funds and save the trouble and possible risk of changing or renewing investments every few years.

May we offer suggestions for the investment of your money in high grade bonds which we have examined carefully and which we can recommend?

Correspondence is invited.

WITH POETS GRAVE AND GAY

SPRING COMES A-MAYING

ALL dressed in vernal radiance,
The fair Spring comes a-Maying;
Along her path the flowerets bloom,
And birds and bees are straying.

Like rare ambrosia of the gods
All things with dew are dripping.
As through the sparkling grass there comes
The robin gaily tripping.

I hear the joy-pipe of the lark
O'er wood and meadow ringing,
While lesser songsters all around
A glad refrain are singing.

From every pond and dank morass
In minor strain carousing,
The late awakened frogs attest
To Nature's careful housing.

A million blossoms deck each vale
The gipsy bee caresses;
Their fragrance floats upon the gale
Like wandering fairy kisses.

My spirits rise to meet the day,
With heart attuned to reason;
Until, with Nature, I can feel
The gladness of the season.

And with serenest faith I know,
By all these bounties heaping,
That God is in his heaven yet,
The world still in his keeping.

Alpena, Mich. CLAUDE A. JONES.

THE SONG AND THE SINGER

WEARY and fretful faces
Were about me everywhere
In the overcrowded street-car,
With its hot and stifling air.
Faces that seemed, I fancied,
To ask, "Is life worth while?"
Too tired, with day's work over,
To even try to smile.

A man in the farther corner
All at once began to sing.
His song was as sweet and simple
As that of birds in spring.
Grim faces brightened to hear it,
And the music of its strain
Made glad the hearts that heard it
As parched fields rejoice in rain.

The song of the unknown singer
Was like a cool, sweet wind
That blows through the dusty city
And leaves its spell behind.
It told of the kiss of welcome
That waits at home's open door,
And the faces of those who listened
Grew bright and glad once more.

O comrade mine, when weary
With the burden and heat of day,
Let's sing like the wayside singer,
And sing our cares away.
Let's learn, for the sake of others,
A song that is blithe with cheer,
And hope that a smile, as we sing it,
May take the place of a tear.

EBEN E. REXFORD.

NOBILITY

TRUE worth is in being, not seeing;
In doing each day that goes by
Some little good—not in the dreaming
Of great things to do by and by.
For whatever men say in blindness
And spite of the fancies of youth,
There's nothing so kindly as kindness,
And nothing so royal as truth.

We get back our mete as we measure;
We cannot do wrong and feel right;
Nor can we give pain and gain pleasure,
For justice avenges each slight.
The air for the wing of the sparrow,
The bush for the robin and wren,
But always the path that is narrow
And straight for the children of men.

ALICE CARY.

The Paint and the Painter

The best materials improperly used will not give satisfactory results.

Nor can skilled workmanship lend durability when the essential qualities of good paint are lacking.

As a rule, the better the workman the better the materials he uses. Painters who have mastered their trade, and know how to mix their own colors, use pure white lead and linseed oil mixed to suit the special requirements of each job.

CARTER
The White
White Lead

is now used by discriminating painters, who observe and test their materials carefully, that they may give their customers the utmost value in paint.

Carter has all the good qualities of old-fashioned white lead and it is whiter and finer because made by a modern process that has enhanced the beauty of paint and increased its efficiency.

The lowest bidder may not be the cheapest in the end. To be sure that your house will be painted in the best possible manner, intrust it to a painter with a reputation for good workmanship and specify "Carter White Lead and linseed oil."

To anyone who has a house to paint, we will send on request, "Pure Paint," a small but comprehensive text book on house painting, with six suggestions for color schemes.

ANSWERED PRAYERS

OFTEN I wonder what it would mean to be a Christian who thought it not worth while to plan with Jesus his daily life. Although I am but a young girl and have lived only six years as a Christian, I would not do without the blessing of being permitted to take the little problems to him and knowing that in the solution of them I will be directed by him. Because of his presence in the smaller things I am enabled to face with prayer and faith the greater things." This good letter comes from E. M. F., Fort Smith, Ark. A reader from Oberlin, Ohio, writes: "God answers my prayers in many cases. One especially I want to mention. I was out of a position, and while I was upstairs praying that one would open, the answer came at once. I was summoned to meet a caller who wanted me to fill a position. I have now held it for seven years. I ask prayers for two people who are not Christians that they may be converted.

"After the sowing cometh the reaping,
After the harvest cometh the song;
After our praying cometh God's answer,
Though to our heart it seemeth so long.
Oh for a faith more simple and trusting!
Oh for a heart completely at rest!
Heavenly Father, hear our petition.
Grant us, we pray thee, whatever is best."

"Some years ago," writes C. G. from Chicago, Ill., "when I had troubles in two most important things in my life God answered my prayers in a most remarkable way." Mrs. E. M. Gillespie, of Austin, Texas, writes: "It is good to read about God's wonderful goodness and mercies to his children all over the country. I am restored to health after fifty-two days of fever—the dear friends from Chicago to California in prayer. I want to make public acknowledgment of God's love and the keeping power of our Christ. I want to thank him for my children, my brothers, and my host of tireless friends, and for my faithful, patient nurse." Mrs. W. H. Dodd writes from Lunenburg, Mass.: "I wish to acknowledge that my heavenly Father has answered a prayer that has made me very thankful. He has answered many of my prayers." A subscriber writes from Liberty, Ariz.: "I wish to add my testimony of God's goodness and mercy in answering prayer. He has blessed me recently. I was in very bad health and great sorrow. He gave me my health and sent me comfort in my grief."

An "Old Subscriber" of San Diego, Calif., writes: "I have long desired to add my testimony to the never-failing answer to prayer when offered in faith and in accordance with His will. The column of Answered Prayers is always a great source of comfort and help to me. I have received many answers to prayer in the past and sometimes almost immediately. We have so many precious promises that we never need to doubt."

THE NEW ADMINISTRATION IN WASHINGTON

Mr. Louis Fitz Henry of Illinois, one of the new members, was elected to Congress on reform principles, and he also is a Presbyterian, as is Mr. Howard Sutherland, the Republican member from Elkins, W. Va. Mr. Sutherland was educated at Westminster College, at Fulton, Mo., and has always devoted his life to public interests. Dr. S. D. Fess of the Sixth Congressional District, Ohio, and former president of Antioch College of that State, is another man of brilliant intellect who has devoted the best years of his life for the uplift of humanity. He was a lad left fatherless almost in infancy, reared in poverty, and earned his own way through college, where he was graduated with the highest honors of his class. He has won distinction as a teacher, lawyer, and writer, and he has made his home a place of helpfulness to many struggling young men and women.

Since his graduation from Harvard in 1904 Mr. John Jacob Rogers, the new member from Lowell, Mass., has been prominently connected with many of the philanthropies of the Old Bay State. He is president of the Lowell Social Service League, trustee of the Old Ladies' Home, of the Rogers Hall School, and of the Lowell Textile School. He is a hearty supporter of the Y. M. C. A. and an efficient member of the Congregational Church. Mr. Lewis, the Republican member from Allentown, Pa., served for two terms as mayor of his city—terms which were notable for good city government. Mr. Crampton, the Michigan editor and publisher who is spending his first term in the House, succeeded in securing the passage of an admirable liquor law while he was a member of the State legislature, and he, too, is a Presbyterian.

And these are but a few of the many men who might be included in an article telling of those who are standing in their high places in Congress to the honor of God and their country.

FOURTH NATIONAL PEACE CONGRESS

take the lead among the nations as the promoter of peace. These activities and the recommendations in connection with them were contained in the following paragraphs:

"The Congress respectfully urges upon the President of the United States the initiation at the earliest practicable date of negotiations for an international agreement for not only the arrest of the current naval and military rivalry, but also of the simultaneous reduction of armament, that the peoples may be relieved from the heavy and exhausting burdens of taxation under which they are now suffering.

"We call upon all friends of peace to guard against the insidious effort to extend military training in the schools and to make naval recruiting stations of their colleges and universities.

"As it is expected that the third Hague Conference will assemble in 1915, the Congress respectfully requests the President to appoint without delay a committee of not less than five persons especially fitted by ability and international experience for the task, to consider what proposals the United States shall present for the program of their Hague Conferences.

"It is the judgment of this Congress that the difference which has arisen between the governments of the United States and Great Britain over the question of Panama tolls should be disposed of by the prompt repeal by Congress of the provision in the canal act for the exemption of vessels engaged in coastwise trade from the payment of tolls. Failing this, the controversy should be submitted without delay to the Hague Court for arbitration."

THE HEART OF A SOLDIER*

I HAVE ridden up to report to Old Peter. I shall give him this letter to mail to you, and a package to give you if—oh, my darling, do you feel the love of my heart, the prayer, as I write that fatal word?"

So wrote General Pickett to his betrothed just before he led the fatal, famous charge at Gettysburg. Miraculously he did not die. In a letter, written the day after the battle, he describes the circumstances under which he added a postscript to the first letter, voicing another "good-by." He had ridden up to Longstreet, whom he affectionately called "Old Peter," for orders. "Pickett," said Longstreet, "I am crucified at the thought of the sacrifice of life which this attack will make. I have instructed Alexander to watch the effect of our fire upon the enemy, and when it begins to tell he must take the responsibility and give you your orders, for I can't."

"While he was yet speaking a note was brought to me from Alexander. After reading it I handed it to him, asking if I should obey and go forward. He looked at me for a moment and held out his hand. Presently, clasping his other hand over mine without speaking, he bowed his head upon his breast. I shall never forget the look in his face nor the clasp of his hand when I said: 'Then, General, I shall lead my division on.' I had ridden only a few paces when I remembered your letter and (forgive me) thoughtlessly scribbled in a corner of the envelope: 'If Old Peter's nod means death, then good-by, and God bless you, little one.'"

A moment later he led forward his 5,000 men through a fiery blast of canister, shot, and shell, of whom he brought back, in little more than an hour, only 1,500. That evening he wrote: "Your soldier lives and mourns, and but for you, my darling, he would rather, a million times rather, be back there with his dead, to sleep for all time in an unknown grave."

Sentences like these give some indication of the strange and startling interest to be found in the collection of the letters of General Pickett to the lady who, in the midst of the terrors of war, became his wife, as they are brought out in book form under the title The Heart of a Soldier, published by Seth Moyle (Incorporated). Simply as a story the book is thrilling and beautiful. The tenderness of a beautiful love and the bitterness of warfare are strangely blended. Compelling as the book is simply as a story, it is even more valuable for the new and vivid light it sheds on the sad history of the Civil War, and the great men on both sides who led the struggle.

In an introductory chapter, Mrs. Pickett gives some most interesting details of her own experiences during the war, containing one of the tenderest and sweetest Lincoln stories ever told. Another unique passage in the book is that describing the celebration fires that were kindled along the Federal lines of encampment in answer to the fires of the Confederate camps which blazed in honor of George Pickett's new-born son; the message Grant, Ingalls and Suckley sent across to the happy father and, later, the silver service they presented to "the new recruit."

One further quotation must suffice. The war is over; the cause for which he fought is lost; the great general is unable to continue his chosen profession; his ancestral home has been destroyed; now his youngest son is dead. And to his wife he writes: "Dear, beautiful mother of an angel, come, say 'Thy will be done,' and try to recognize the wisdom of our Lord. See, my lily, how well your soldier has learned his lesson. It was you who taught him to believe—to look up and trust. Come, now—take your spelling-book and let him teach you the Word."

No-Rim-Cut Tires 10% Oversize

No Petty Saving

Goodyear Tires have become, in late years, the greatest sensation in Tiredom.

They far outsell all others. The demand has multiplied so fast that last year's sales exceeded our previous 12 years put together. This has not come about, as you must know, through any petty saving.

We Did This

We brought out the No-Rim-Cut tire, which we still control.

With old-type tires, rim-cutting ruined 23 per cent. This new-type tire wiped out that loss completely.

Its 10 per cent oversize, with the average car, adds 25 per cent to the tire mileage.

These two features together have saved tire users a good many million dollars.

Also This

We compared, by actual mileage, 240 formulas and fabrics to learn which served the best.

We compared by mileage, every material, every method and process.

We devised machines which give to every inch of every layer exactly equal tension.

We employ a curing process, very unusual. It adds to our cost this year about one million dollars—just to add more mileage.

And we spend each year, in learning ways to better tires, about $100,000.

That Is Why

That is why the Goodyear tire holds top place in Tiredom. Legions of men have proved by meters its immense economy.

You can prove it in the same decisive way. You can see that these tires can't rim-cut. You can see the oversize. And you can see by mileage figures what they save on upkeep. Do this. The savings are too big to miss.

HER "BEST FRIEND"

A Woman Thus Speaks of Postum.

We usually consider our best friends those who treat us best.

Some persons think coffee a real friend, but watch it carefully awhile and observe that it is one of the meanest of all enemies for it stabs one while professing friendship.

Coffee contains a poisonous drug—caffeine—which injures the delicate nervous system and frequently sets up disease in one or more organs of the body, if its use is persisted in.

"I had heart palpitation and nervousness for four years and the doctor told me the trouble was caused by coffee. He advised me to leave it off, but I thought I could not," writes a Wis. lady.

"On the advice of a friend I tried Postum and it so satisfied me I did not care for coffee after a few days trial of Postum.

"As weeks went by and I continued to use Postum my weight increased from 98 to 118 pounds, and the heart trouble left me. I have used it a year now and am stronger than I ever was. I can hustle up stairs without any heart palpitation, and I am free from nervousness.

"My children are very fond of Postum and it agrees with them. My sister liked it when she drank it at my house; now she has Postum at home and has become very fond of it. You may use my name if you wish as I am not ashamed of praising my best friend — Postum." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum now comes in new concentrated form called Instant Postum. It is regular Postum, so processed at the factory that only the soluble portions are retained.

A spoonful of Instant Postum with hot water, and sugar and cream to taste, produce instantly a delicious beverage.

Write for the little book, "The Road to Wellville."

"There's a Reason" for Postum.

that sin is really destroyed and eradicated from the soul, the other that it is "suppressed." This discussion grows chiefly from a difference of opinion as to the definition of the word "sin." Wesley's great expression was "purity of intention." He held that the Scriptures clearly taught a kind of perfection that was attainable in this life; it is not "angelic perfection," or "Adamic perfection," but "Christian perfection."

E. E. P. Please explain Acts 2: 4. Did they all understand each other or not? The reason I ask is that some people in this vicinity claim that they are "filled with the Holy Ghost," and when they assemble for prayer they talk in some strange language. Sometimes they are able to interpret and sometimes not. Is this the same thing as the occurrence at Pentecost?

So far as we know there have been no well authenticated cases in recent years of believers receiving the "gift of tongues." On occasions when the gift, if genuine, would produce helpful results, as in speaking to foreigners, or to heathen, or to persons of another tongue lying at the point of death, there are, so far as we know, no recent records of the successful use of this gift. It was a recognized element of the Christianity of the New Testament, though Paul did not give it a high place in the list of spiritual gifts. He seems to have had among his churches frequent recurrences of the same kind of trouble experienced in the present over this question. It is possible to explain the event at Pentecost in one of two ways: either the disciples spoke in their own native tongue and were miraculously understood by the foreigners, which would seem to be the natural interpretation of verses 7-11, or else the disciples retold the facts of their blessing in different languages, with which they were not previously familiar. The further New Testament passages which mention this gift imply that it was at times the ability to speak in another language and at times the speaking in a new language, which certain of the hearers were miraculously able to comprehend. While not wishing to be harsh in our judgment of those who profess the gift of tongues in the present day, we must state that usually such profession is accompanied by clear indications of fanaticism.

H. I. M., Petersburg, Mich. Speaking in a strictly Christian sense, a man should vote as he prays. Certainly he would not be justified in voting one way and praying another.

O. W. H., Provo, Utah, writes: "It has often occurred to me that as the Mormons are criticized so severely for believing in modern revelation, etc., you or some other should start some educational plan to reclaim them from their error. Peter said on one occasion: 'Lord, if I would leave thee, where would I go?' So in place of persecuting the Mormons and finding fault with their system of religion, point out the way. Name the creed which is right and give reliable information and sound reasons. Religion should be the most interesting subject in the world, and we should be very tolerant in listening to each other's reasons and beliefs. If you have a truth, I want it, and I voice the sentiment of every Mormon; but I have no room for error. The partition wall should be broken down, and Christians should come together in the right spirit, and be free and open to receive any truth that will build us up, and protect us temporally as well as spiritually. Is it not the mission and office of the church to offer temporal salvation as well as spiritual? The true church of Christ should be thoroughly constructive in every particular. Whatever our building is made of, whether of gold, silver, precious stone, hay or stubble, it will be tried as to its strength and durability. So unless our system of religion is founded on truth, it will surely crumble and fall." This letter from a Mormon shows a spirit of tolerance and fairness toward others which is doubtless shared by many of the same faith. We know of no purpose on the part of any religious body to criticize unduly, and we hope and believe the day for intolerance has passed. Mormonism must stand or fall by the verdict of its own people, whose honest convictions will tolerate nothing but truth and will sweep away error and imposture once they are detected. We would be pleased to hear from other readers in Utah on the same subject.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Christian's Bible Study*

CONSECRATION, Zeal, Service, Humility, Prayers—these are the factors we have studied so far this year in the life of the "Ideal Christian." To-day we consider his Bible Study. This does not mean that Bible Study is the least important of all these, or that it comes last in the list of things the Christian must do or possess. He begins the Christian life by studying his Bible, he progresses by studying his Bible, he finishes his race with the Bible in his hand.

A few practical suggestions: Master the contents of the Bible. A great deal of Bible study has been too fragmentary. Verses were learned here and there; isolated passages studied. Dr. W. W. White, president of the Bible Teachers' Training School at New York, has probably done more than any other Bible teacher to found and spread a system of study in which the contents of the books and chapters are really mastered. His students are trained so they can go through a book and say what each chapter teaches or narrates. This is the way the Bible ought to be read and studied.

The Bible student should also study outside helps for the light they throw on the Bible itself. The authors of the various books, the time at which they were written, the history of the times, the geography of the countries, all these help one to understand the contents of the Bible itself. Such books as Edersheim's Life and Times of the Messiah, Connybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Smith's Bible Dictionary, or, if a more extensive work can be afforded. Hastings's Bible Dictionary, are of great practical value.

A very delicate point arises as to the extent to which one should keep his own personal needs in mind while studying the Bible. This should be done, of course, but it can be overdone. If we are not careful we shall be putting our own thoughts into the Bible rather than letting the Bible speak for itself. We must go to its pages with open, unbiased minds to learn what it has to say. Yet the earnest soul will always be on the lookout. and rightly so, for special, personal messages suited to his own peculiar needs of the moment. And this is the amazing thing about the Bible, that souls in all manner of condition and in every kind of trouble and perplexity, physical, mental, spiritual, social, financial, and of every other sort, go to the Bible and find help.

Still another care we must exercise. We must get the broad, general principles of Scripture; then we must realize that there are a few sharp, cardinal facts, closely related to spiritual needs, which are to be found in various places in the Book. The fact of the atonement for sin; the facts of the Holy Spirit; the teachings about holiness and faith—the soul that is keenly alert is skilful in finding the passages which illuminate and emphasize big things like these. Here again he must not read them into passages which relate to other things, but he will be quick to see light on great questions like these wherever it is to be found.

Too much stress cannot be laid upon the advantage of memorizing Scripture passages. It is altogether impossible to estimate the value of having these words stored away in the mind so that the Holy Spirit may bring them to our attention just at the time they will be of service. Often such a message comes almost as if a voice had actually spoken. We may forget that we had ever learned that passage, but here it is, brought to our attention to guide or purify or cheer us.

Finally, we should train our minds to feel all the time the presence of Christ as we read and study. He is in that Book. Its pages are a garden where we walk and talk with him. We find him in the church; we find him in history, in nature, in music, but pre-eminently we find him in the Bible. Through its words he speaks to us; in its pages we see him; faith in its sayings leads us to love him, to become his friends and followers. Faith is the connecting link between the treasures of the Bible and our own great need. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews mourns that the word preached to the ancient Jews "did not profit them, not being mixed with faith in them that heard it." As we mix our Bible reading with faith, as we venture out upon its promises and trust the Christ of whom it tells, we shall find our souls growing pure and strong and our lives rich and fragrant and fruitful.

* "THE IDEAL CHRISTIAN. VI. HIS BIBLE STUDY." Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, June 1, 1913. Deut. 6: 1-9. (Consecration Meeting.)

The Cross of Jesus*

WE ARE standing to-day in contemplation of the most important event in the world's history, unless, indeed, we should make an exception of the departure from the grave of the Man who was slain on the cross of which our lesson tells. Did you ever stop to think that no single event has ever stirred the human race so deeply or continued its influence so long and so mightily as the death of Jesus Christ on his cross? Libraries of books have been written about it, mighty organizations have been formed upon it as a foundation. Its very form has become the symbol of nations and a model for architecture and ornament.

Why has the cross of Jesus stirred the human race so mightily? Surely Epworth Leaguers should know the answer to this question. It is because that cross gives the only answer to the otherwise baffling problem of sin. The experience of sin, the queer and dreadful trouble which comes to the human feelings because of this sense of guilt, leads men to do all sorts of things in the hope of getting relief. Different religions offer different suggestions. Pleasure holds out its invitation with the promise that these distressing feelings of guilt will be conquered and put away if more pleasure is indulged in. Work offers its allurements; sleep gives temporary relief. But the only satisfactory and final answer to this terrible problem of guilt is the cross of Jesus. History records the fact of his death; the history of two thousand years bears witness to the fact that he is "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world."

But the cross of Jesus does more than merely bring relief from the painful guilt of past sins. Sin is more than a record of past deeds; it is a present power, working for the destruction of the soul. And the only real method of deliverance from that power of sin is found in the cross of Jesus. The influence of the fact of that death upon the soul who really wants to be freed from the power of sin brings the deliverance longed for.

This is an experiment that any soul can prove on any day or night. Christ's cross stands, the steadiest fact in all the shifting scenes of this world. If you like, you may find at this moment relief from the guilt of past sins and power over the temptations which beset you now. You may tell the story to any soul that is in need of deliverance and prove again that the old story still has power in these modern days to comfort and purify human lives.

* "THE CROSS OF JESUS." Epworth League Topic for Sunday, June 1, 1913. Matt. 26: 27, 28; Heb. 12: 2; 5: 8, 9; Luke 22: 44.

Stammering Cured by Education

The Great Work of Benj. N. Bogue, Author, Teacher and Founder of the Bogue Institute for Stammerers

Afflicted in childhood with speech impediments that made him practically an outcast from human companionship, this remarkable man worked out his own cure and then dedicated his life to the task of curing other stammerers. Gives a copy of his great book free to all who ask for it.

The Man

Benj. N. Bogue

IF you were to ask the average resident of Indianapolis who is the happiest man in that city the answer would doubtless be: "Benjamin N. Bogue." Yet for almost twenty years Mr. Bogue was living a life of melancholy, gloom and despondency, sensitively shunning all normal social intercourse, avoided by his aquaintances and pointed out to strangers as "the worst stammerer in Indiana."

A Blighted Childhood

In his early childhood Benjamin N. Bogue had become afflicted with an impediment of speech. At school he was unable to recite when called upon although he knew perfectly well what he desired to say. At play-time he had no part in the healthy pastimes of other children because his infirmity made him "different"; he was laughed at, teased and taunted by thoughtless companions who delighted in witnessing the contortions and grimaces he made when attempting to talk.

His parents sent him from specialist to specialist, from doctor to doctor and from stammering school to stammering school. But instead of getting better he grew worse. At eighteen years of age he was obliged to abandon his career as a student at Earlham College. His instructors told him that he could not possibly make a success of life unless he could be cured of the affliction that made him a burden to himself and a source of discomfort to all with whom he came into contact.

Business Failure Predicted

Leaving college, Mr. Bogue endeavored to secure employment but found that nobody would hire him because of his impediment. One day a prominent business man said to young Bogue: "Young man, cure yourself. You will never amount to anything until you can talk like ordinary people. Nobody else seems to be able to help you. So it is up to you."

Mr. Bogue Cures Himself

This was the beginning of a new life to the young man. It thrilled him with a new purpose, a new impulse, a new ambition. Out of the many failures and disappointments of his previous years he had learned how stammering could not be cured. From this as his beginning point he set himself the task of discovering how it can be cured. After months of study and experiment he suddenly discovered that by an effort of the will he could speak certain words with perfect clearness. Little by little he increased his power of vocalization and in incredibly short time he astonished his friends by appearing among them once more perfectly able to converse without hesitation and without even a suggestion of stammering.

The Institution

WHEN the Honorable Hervey D. Vories, Ex-State Superintendent of Public Instruction of Indiana, heard Mr. Bogue speak after his restoration to normal speech he urged the young man to found a school for the instruction of other stammerers, saying to Mr. Bogue, whom he had always known as a hopeless stammerer: "It is a noble life that lives to do others good."

Thus was founded The Bogue Institute for Stammerers at Indianapolis, Indiana, an institution that has been the means of restoring to perfect speech hundreds of men, women and children whose lives had seemed to be doomed to failure and wretchedness because of the affliction of stammering.

Known to One Hundred Thousand Stammerers

Mr. Bogue's fame rapidly spread to every corner of the continent. Thousands of stammerers sought his advice and help. Every day he meets and advises scores of them. Since the founding of The Bogue Institute Mr. Bogue has personally interviewed and advised nearly twelve thousand stammerers. Personally and by mail he has diagnosed the cases of almost twenty-five thousand stammerers and he has corresponded with one hundred thousaud victims of speech impediments.

Stammering Cannot be Cured by Mail

Understanding the laws that govern speech and knowing what principles are violated in every case of speech impediment, Mr. Bogue sincerely believes that stammering and stuttering cannot be cured by mail. The Bogue Institute is strictly educational in its methods and ideals. It accepts for treatment no cases in which the speech impediment is due to organic or physical defects and it uses no medicines or surgery in effecting its cures. "Stammering," declares Mr. Bogue "is not a physical disease. It is purely mental and is due to the failure of the nervous system to properly respond to the impulses of the brain. The only way that stammering can be cured is by establishing a healthy co-ordination between the organs of speech and the brain centers. This is a matter of education—not a matter of medicine or surgery."

The Buildings

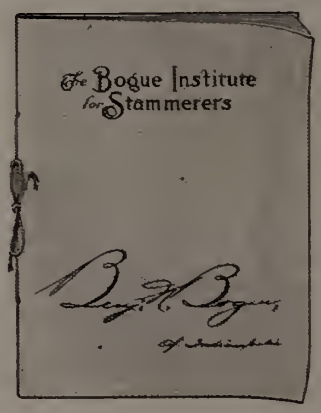
The main building of The Bogue Institute for Stammerers is a magnificent structure of pressed brick and cut stone located in one of the most desirable residence sections of Indianapolis. It is three stories high and is a model of comfort and convenience. The floors are of hard wood; the rooms are large and cheerful, lighted by electricity and heated by steam. There are numerous bathrooms all equipped with the most modern and sanitary plumbing.

A solid masonry wall runs through the building from front to rear dividing it into what is practically two distinct buildings. One of these is occupied by men and boys and the other by girls and women students. Separate entrances are provided and the only means of communication between the two departments is through the executive and administrative suites.

Responsible attendants are in charge of the dormitories and they not only look after the moral and social welfare of the students but they see that every physical comfort is provided. In this way the Bogue Institute maintains the very highest standards of environment for all students, surrounding them with the refining influences of a well regulated home. The class rooms and gymnasium are in a separate building and are perfectly equipped for their purposes.

Complete and Permanent Cure Guaranteed

Students are admitted at all times and are encouraged in every way to make the most rapid progress consistent with thoroughness. The time usually required for effecting a cure at The Bogue Institute for Stammerers varies. The average pupil has remained from three to six weeks. Mr. Bogue issues to every student whom he accepts for treatment at the time of enrollment his guarantee in writing.



The Book

DURING the past ten years Mr. Bogue has published several books on stammering, its causes, effects, treatment and cure. These books are recognized as the most complete and reliable works ever compiled on this subject and they have all run through several editions. But by far the most notable of Mr. Bogue's publications is his latest volume which has but recently come from the press.

This book tells the story of Mr. Bogue's life and work. It is as fascinating as a romance. It is full of human interest being a story of this man's struggles and of his final triumph. The chapters describing the experiences of other stammerers who have come to Mr. Bogue for help, the letters from those who have come to him hopeless and have gone away rejoicing in their restoration to the power of perfect speech, the pathos of those who have suffered and who open their hearts to this man because they know that he can understand and sympathize, the testimony of multitudes of representative people in all walks of life who bear witness to the great work of Mr. Bogue and of his institution will appeal to every person who stammers or who has a loved one afflicted with speech impediments.

This book is handsomely bound and profusely illustrated. It is printed on fine paper and is in every way a book that will grace any library. Although the cost of this book to Mr. Bogue was great, it was not published for profit. Mr. Bogue wants every stammerer to read it and to draw from its pages such knowledge, hope and guidance as shall be of permanent help. For this reason he will send a copy of this book FREE to every reader of the Christian Herald who writes him asking for it.

The coupon at the bottom of this page is for your convenience only. If you do not wish to deface the page of this magazine write on a postal card and a copy of the book will be sent to you by return mail. The only condition Mr. Bogue makes in this connection is that you write clearly so that the book may not be lost in the mail. Write today.

THE RUIN OF THE ANCIENT ROMAN BATHS AT PERGAMOS, PART OF WHICH IS NOW USED AS A GREEK CHURCH

THE SEVEN CHURCHES OF ASIA

*PERGAMOS, THE CITY OF SATAN'S SEAT

BY REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Founder and President of the Christian Endeavor Society

WE LEFT Soma, the terminus of one branch of the Anatolian Railway, early one bright February morning for Pergamos, or Pergamum as it is called in the Revision, the ancient capital and most important city of Asia Minor. Soma is a good place to get away from, and, to vary a modern gibe that rival cities sometimes throw at one another, the best thing about Soma was the araba which took us away from it. This araba is a strong spring cart covered with dirty white canvas, looking not unlike a butcher's cart. It has no seats, and our two missionary friends and ourselves piled our suitcases, our rugs and other impedimenta in the bottom of the araba to afford as comfortable seats as possible for the bouncing, jolting journey of forty-two kilometers that lay before us. Our driver was a picturesque-looking Greek, sad and gloomy but handsome, and with a Byronic cast of feature. But his acts were not as handsome as his face, and he proved, before we were through with him, to be a grasping rascal. Pergamos is the only one of the Seven Cities that must be reached by araba, for all the rest lie near one of the three lines of railway in Turkey. The February air is crisp, but not too cold, for spring comes early in this part of Asia Minor. The apricot and peach trees are in full bloom, and the almond trees flourish on every side, reminding us of Solomon's description of the hoary head of the aged saint. The ride was a charming one so far as the scenery was concerned, and if as much could be said for the road over which we traveled one could not wish a more delightful journey than that from Soma to Pergamos. But, like all Turkish roads, this highway in many parts is abominable. There were stretches of decent road alternating with other stretches which are quite indescribable, where the araba sways and pitches and rolls like a ship in a heavy sea. Much of the way we seemed to be on the edge of a great natural bowl, or saucer, with the valley below us, and the outer rim of the bowl on the opposite horizon. In the early morning, and in the sunset light, the purple hills in the distance are beautiful beyond compare. Especially in the evening a long after-glow illumines them, a glow even more characteristic of Asia Minor than of Switzerland.

We pass many groves of olive trees and others of mulberry, while cherry and peach orchards abound in many places. This is a cotton country too, and the few still ungathered bolls of last year's crop decorated the dried stalks. Now and then we passed a rude little Turkish village heralded in advance usually by a cemetery filled with cypress trees and dilapidated tombstones.

As we drove farther from Soma small streams became more numerous, and we rattled across many rude wooden bridges, unless our araba-ji preferred to drive through the stream in order to tighten up his tires and lave the feet of his tired horses. Kilometer stone after kilometer stone was passed, and at last a turn in the road showed us a glorious spectacle; the lofty citadel of ancient Pergamos, the city which for some hundreds of years was the most noted wealthy and powerful metropolis in the whole province of Asia. Sir William Ramsay, a noted traveler and archeologist, writes: "History marked it out as the royal city, and not less clearly has nature done so. No city of the whole of Asia Minor, so far as I have seen, and there are few of any importance which I have not seen, possesses the same imposing and dominating aspect. It is the one city of the land which forced from me the exclamation, 'A royal city!' There is something unique and overpowering in its effects, planted as it is on its magnificent hill, standing out boldly in the level plain, and dominating the valley and the mountains on the south." Though I can scarcely share to the full Sir William Ramsay's enthusiasm for the site of Pergamos, it is certainly striking and imposing, and still more so when viewed as he viewed it in the light of its splendid history.

MODERN PERGAMEMIANS

For 2,500 years a city larger or smaller has stood upon the slope of this commanding hill, or nestled at its feet, but it was not until three centuries before Christ that Philetærus revolted from King Lysimachus, whose vassal he was, and founded the kingdom of Pergamos. A succession of brilliant kings named Attalus reigned in Pergamos, and the last of them, Attalus III, when he saw that the Roman power was to become dominant throughout the world, made his kingdom over by will to the Roman emperor. Then it became the "province of Asia," to which frequent allusion is made in the Bible, and Pergamos for two centuries and a half more was the capital of this great province. A fact most interesting to us in studying the history of the Seven Churches of Asia, and, by the way, all these seven churches were situated within the border of the ancient kingdom of Pergamos, is the fact that the first temple where the emperor was worshiped in any provincial Roman city was Pergamos. Here about thirty years before Christ was built this splendid temple in honor of Rome and Augustus, and to it were brought in after years many a Christian who was commanded to worship the statue of the emperor and burn incense before it. If he refused the most awful fate awaited him—martyrdom by burning at the stake. Or perhaps he would be transported to Rome, and there thrown to the wild beasts in the Colosseum.

When we remember these facts, and that this temple was the place where idolatrous worship was enforced by all the mighty power of Rome, we can understand why St. John, the Revelator, should call it "Satan's seat." Pergamos had long been a peculiarly idolatrous city. The native Anatolians worshiped animal gods, and though when the Greeks came they introduced more spiritual, or at least more artistic, divinities like Jupiter, Minerva, and Æsculapius, yet the animal gods still were worshiped by the common people, the natives of the province. One of the coins of Pergamos represents Caracalla, the emperor, adoring the serpent god at Pergamos. Another coin represents a serpent wriggling out of the mystic box of Dionysos.

Another characteristic of Pergamos was that its governor had the right of life and death. He had absolute authority to kill or to spare, and in St. John's time the man who exercised this absolute authority with which the ruler of Pergamos was invested, was bitterly hostile to the Christians. The one who wielded the power of life and death, the Jus gladii, or "the law of the sword," hated them with a cruel hatred.

All of these facts we must bear in mind as we study the words of the Revelator, the one who styled himself when he wrote to the angel of the church at Pergamos as "He that hath the sharp sword with the two edges," and evident reference to the law of the sword possessed by the proconsul of Pergamos. It may be of passing interest to know that Pergamos to-day seems to be the seat of a considerable manufacture of cutlery and swords, and one of the mementoes which I have brought away from the modern city was, not a sharp sword, but a sharp knife with two edges, of a style such as I have seen in no other part of the world.

The Revelator goes on to say to the beleaguered Christians in this idolatrous city: "I know where thou dwellest, even where Satan's throne is—the great temple of Rome and Augustus—where is set up the image of the emperor before which the inhabitants bow down and to which they burn incense as a sign of their loyalty to the Roman emperor. But even there, where Satan's throne is, thou holdest fast my name, and hast not denied my faith."

These must have been precious comforting words to the faithful few. One of these faithful ones is singled out and mentioned by name, "Antipas is my faithful witness, who was slain among you, where Satan dwelleth." But doubtless there was many another Christian who shared the same fate, perhaps hundreds of them brought from all the country around, and taken to Satan's Seat to be tested as to the reality of their faith in Jesus Christ. Alas! all the Pergamenian Christians were not like Antipas, and "the One that hath the sharp sword," because of them, had a "few things" against the church in Pergamos.

Those that held the doctrines of Balaam were largely represented in the church of Pergamos. They were the lax, yielding Christians of their day, who found it easy to conform to the ways of the world and the temptations of the time. They had little of the Puritan type of blood in their veins, and they could easily excuse themselves, doubtless, not only for eating things sacrificed to idols, but for occasionally bowing before the statue of the emperor, and burning a little incense before it. "The Lord knows," they doubtless said, "that we are simply showing our loyalty to Rome by conforming to the customs of the day. The emperor is a mere man and his image we do not worship, but only bow before it to show our obedience to the authority of our emperor." Doubtless the Nicolaitans of those days had quite as many excuses for their worldly practices as the Nicolaitans of modern times. But to them comes the sharp and terrible reproof, "Repent, or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against thee with the sword of my mouth."

But to the faithful members of the church in Pergamos comes a blessed and appropriate reward. The "hidden manna" was to be theirs, which they might eat and gain strength for their terrible trials.

According to Jewish history, King Josiah, or the prophet Jeremiah, when Solomon's temple was destroyed, hid a pot of manna, which the Israelites had gathered in the wilderness and had kept in the holy of holies, that it might not be captured by Nebuchadnezzar's army. What became of this pot of manna was the subject of different traditions; one, that it had been carried up into heaven, another that it was concealed in a cave of Mount Sinai to be revealed when Messiah came. More significant still was the "white stone," which was to be given to the Christian who did not deny his Lord even in Satan's Seat. In the stone was his new name. It was an old Jewish custom, when a man was sick even unto death as it was supposed, to give him another name by which, if he recovered, he was known throughout the rest of his life. To the Christians who were faithful, who overcame the sharpness of death, and were not afraid of its terrors, a new name was to be given, written upon the white stone, a name showing that they were Christians. This very word itself was a new name, given not many years before at Antioch to this despised and persecuted sect.

What do we find at Pergamos to-day? We see in fact two cities: a city of ruins without a single inhabitant, and a city of the living, now called Bergama, mean and squalid to be sure in comparison with its ancient glory, but busy and bustling, and interesting as a typical center of modern Greek and Turkish life. Long caravans of camels march through its streets in almost endless procession, loaded with wood, charcoal, chick-peas, millet, wheat, sesame, lentils, leeks, carrots, black turnips, chopped hay and other kinds of produce. The bazars are gay with bright colors, wadded jackets, embroidered saddlebags, tinsel ornaments for the heads of the women, and all sorts of cheap jewelry that Birmingham or Attleboro can furnish.

The streets are paved with cobblestones set on edge and are horrible for the pedestrian. A sewer runs down the middle of each street, and garbage and refuse of all kinds are thrown out of every doorway for the pariah dogs to fight over. There seem to be as many dogs as men, most of them miserable depressed creatures, who fight with each other over a refuse pail, or lie curled up in the sun by the hour together.

One of the most attractive features of Bergama is the fountains, and many an old sarcophagus, beautifully sculptured on every side, is now used as a watering trough. Veiled Turkish women with the tip of their noses showing, unveiled Greek women and a multitude of men in baggy blue trousers are the principal people whom one meets upon the street. In the provision shops one sees groceries of various kinds, oranges, dates and peanuts, leeks, onions and garlic, spinach, turnips and potatoes, long strings of dried okra, cauliflower and cabbages, dried squid and devilfish from the Ægean, and the various kinds of helva in which the Turkish heart delights.

Such a modern city, however, you might find almost anywhere in Turkey, but no other such city as the ancient Pergamos do you find the wide world around. Climb with me the steep slope of the ancient citadel, at first through the narrow street lined with the stone huts of the modern Pergamenians, and very soon we come to the borders of the ancient walled city. More than thirty years ago the Germans began to excavate ancient Pergamos and made some wonderful finds, most of which were transported to the Pergamenian Museum in Berlin, but still there is much left to remind the traveler of the glorious city on whose grave he is walking. There are many white stones lying about on every hand, not the white pebbles of which the Revelator spoke, on which the new name was to be written, but great masses of marble, fine capitals beautifully carved, lofty columns, some standing erect, and others prostrate, with their drums scattered about. A few headless torsos and fragments of arms and legs strew the ground. Here is a great gymnasium, covering many rods in length, with many beautiful columns still standing, where the Grecian youths exercised themselves in games of all sorts, and there the remains of a stately old palace.

Above this, on a higher slope, are the theatres and temples, the great altar of Zeus, of which there is nothing left but an enormous base of solid masonry. Still higher up on the hill is the temple of Athenæ Polias, a library, and beyond this, perhaps the most interesting spot of all to the Christian, the Temple of Rome and Augustus, "Satan's Seat," or

A MOTHER OF MEN AND OF CHURCHES

AMONG the historic churches of our country there is none which stands out more prominently than the "Dorchester Church." It is not great on account of the beauty and grandeur of its architecture, or the importance of its location, or the prominence of its ministers, or the number and wealth of its communicants. In all these matters it is quite modest. The house is an old frame building, located in a comparatively obscure country district, its ministers have never been widely known, and the whole number of its communicants for over a century does not exceed the present membership of many large city churches.

This church was first founded at Dorchester, Mass., in 1630, only ten years after the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth Rock. In 1696 some of these members removed to South Carolina, and founded a colony which they called Dorchester. Then about 1753 the colony again removed to the Medway Province, in what is now Liberty County, Ga. At first no definite name seems to have been given, either to the church or to the community. Finally the district became known as the "Midway District," and the colony and church were called "Midway."

From the settlement of this Midway colony in 1753 to the present time the colony has had four houses of worship. The first one was a log house built in 1754 a little east of the present site. In this they held their first communion, September 8, 1754. The second building was a frame house built in 1756. This was burned during the Revolution in 1778. From this time till after the Revolution ended the colony was without a house of worship.

Then the third building, a coarse, rude structure, was erected in 1784. The fourth and last building, a strong frame structure, was erected in 1792, and is still in a remarkable state of preservation. Every board in this edifice was sawed by hand by slaves, and every nail and bolt was wrought by hand. The house has recently been repaired, the roof being strapped with iron bands.

Until 1871 this organization was known as the "Midway Congregational Church." Since that time it has been Presbyterian, and has gone by the name of the "Dorchester Church," in honor of the original organization at Dorchester, Mass., and also because it is in the little village of Dorchester, Ga. The old Midway Congregational Church was never formally dissolved, but was simply exhausted by repeated removals to newer organizations near by. The old church literally gave itself away to other churches. Out of it have grown six neighboring churches. These, with the Dorchester Church, constitute seven centers of Christian influence which now represent the old "Midway Congregational Church."

Though its house of worship, its location, its ministers and the size of its membership have no special distinction, this church is pre-eminently noteworthy for the quality and influence of its membership. More influential and eminent men have gone out from this church than from almost any other church in America.

Here is a partial record of her achievements: Out of her fold have come a number of statesmen and other high officials, including two mayors of cities, four governors, two judges of superior courts and six congressmen. Two of these governors—Button Gwinnett and Lyman Hall—were signers of the Declaration of Independence. One of these superior judges, Hon. John E. Ward, was also the first minister plenipotentiary sent by any nation to China. Two of those elected to Congress were senators, one of whom was Hon. John Elliot, grandson of the noted "Apostle to the Indians." Six counties of Georgia have been named after families who belonged to this church.

This church has produced six editors and five authors. One of these authors was Dr. Abiel Holmes, father of Oliver Wendell Holmes, so well known in American literature. Dr. Abiel Holmes was pastor of the Midway Church for six years.

A large number of educators have gone out from this old church, among whom are one president of a State normal school, one professor in a medical college, two chancellors of universities, three presidents of female colleges, and nine professors in other colleges and seminaries.

This prolific church is believed to have sent out more ministers of the Gospel than any other church in America. Among them are six foreign missionaries and over eighty regular pastors of churches! It is remarkable that in this number of ministers there are fifty Presbyterians, seventeen Baptists, thirteen Methodists, one Episcopal, and not one Congregationalist!

In addition to such a record as this, the venerable church has produced a number of prominent business men, public school officials and teachers, lawyers, physicians and other professional men.

In the Midway Cemetery lie the remains of nearly twelve hundred persons. Here we find entombed the remains of Governor Nathan Brownson, Senator John Elliot, Commodore John McIntosh, General Daniel Stewart. In this cemetery is also the tomb of that remarkable man, John Quarterman, one of the original settlers, from whom have descended twenty-two ministers of the Gospel, four of whom were foreign missionaries!

Surely here is a church that has been willing to "spend and be spent for Christ," and whose noble record beautifully exhibits the spirit of him who came "not to be ministered unto but to minister."

COMMEMORATING A GREAT AMERICAN

ON THE afternoon of May 10 there was unveiled on Morningside Heights in New York City, overlooking the park at One Hundred and Sixteenth Street, a monument to the memory of Carl Schurz, statesman and soldier. When this famous German-American passed away about seven years ago a movement was started for the erection of this commemorative statue. Karl Bitter, himself a German-American, was commissioned to execute the work as soon as sufficient funds had been raised by popular subscription.

It was a bright but windy and rather chilly Saturday afternoon that saw the formal presentation of Mr. Bitter's artistic effort to the city. About two o'clock a long and brilliant parade formed in Broadway between Seventy-Second and Seventy-Eighth Streets and marched to the music of many bands up to Morningside Heights. Several regiments of United States regulars were followed in the parade by militia, infantry, cavalry and artillery, while the German veterans and German military and civic societies brought up the rear.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, ex-ambassador to Great Britain, presided at the unveiling ceremonies. With Mr. Choate in the speakers' stand were Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador; William H. Carpenter, Provost of Columbia University; the mayor of New York and several other civic officials. At the right of the stand seats were reserved for the members of the Schurz family and their friends. Seated here were Mrs. Antonie Jussen, sister of Carl Schurz; the Misses Agatha and Marianne Schurz, his daughters; Carl L. Schurz, his son; and Mrs. Schurz.

In opening the ceremonies Mr. Choate read a letter from President Wilson, who regretted his inability to be present, and said in his letter: "One of the most gratifying elements of our national life is the part played by men born on the other side of the water, who have chosen America for their permanent home, and who have caught the real spirit of our institutions and have lent themselves and all the fine force that is in them to patriotic service in promotion of the cause of liberty and justice."

Mr. Choate then paid tribute to the memory of Carl Schurz. He reviewed the humble circumstances of Mr. Schurz's early life and his struggles in behalf of German freedom. Mr. Choate said in concluding: "Carl Schurz came here when twenty-three years of age, bringing with him those German ideals which have made his native country so great and which have aided so much in the upbuilding of our own. He came here without friends, unable to speak the English language, and yet he was soon a master of that language and a leader in American thought.

"Lincoln sent him as ambassador to Spain, where his work is known to history and to all of us. But when the war started he returned here and gave his sword to the country for four years. I am glad to see here to-day some of his comrades, some of the survivors of those battles in which Carl Schurz took so brave and active a part. After the war he became a leader among the German people in his adopted country.

"As a leader he did what is so seldom seen and yet so necessary in the upholding of the best in public life. He put expediency above personal and party advantage. His work will long be remembered as a purifying example to the young men of this country."

Miss Agatha Schurz, accompanied by her brother, unveiled the statue with the assistance of several members of the memorial committee. Mayor Gaynor accepted the memorial on behalf of the city, paying tribute of praise in a well-turned speech to the sturdy German element of our population of which Carl Schurz was such a shining example. Count von Bernstorff sounded the note that connected this American patriot with his former fatherland. The count said in his eulogy:

"He was one of the martyrs of the movement which had its origin in the craving of the soul of the German nation for unity and political freedom. Twenty-two years later Bismarck completed the creation of united Germany, the idea for which Carl Schurz had given the strength of his youth. From that time on dates the reconciliation of the Germans at home and those in the United States who had fought for German unity; a reconciliation which never found a better expression than in the words of Bismarck, who said: 'As a German I am proud of Carl Schurz.' I came here to-day to repeat Bismarck's words, and to say to you, as a German, I am proud of Carl Schurz."

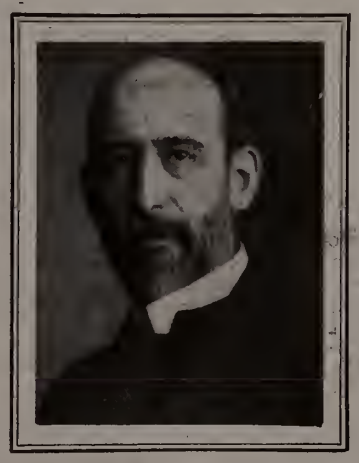
The Schurz Monument stands in a circular plot fifty feet in diameter at the head of the flight of steps leading from Morningside Park to the driveway and facing the buildings of Columbia University, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, and St. Luke's Hospital. The full-length figure of the patriot in bronze stands upon a granite pedestal on the periphery of the semi-circle. The statue is nine feet high and shows Mr. Schurz in the long coat and cloak of the style he generally wore. The pedestal bears reliefs in polished granite, and the inscription: "CARL SCHURZ, Defender of Liberty and Friend of Human Right."

THE RURAL CHURCH AND COUNTRY LIFE

BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS

ARE we not, in connection with the present country life movement, in some danger of asking too much of the rural church and too many things of the country minister? This is a fair question, for we Americans are rather prone to let our enthusiasm run away with us and overdo things, which are often suddenly dropped when the results do not come up to our expectations.

Here we are vigorously urging that candidates for the ministry should spend at least two years at an agricultural college before entering a theological seminary. It is seriously contended that "some rural pastors have more than doubled their efficiency by taking a course in an agricultural college," and that "the field for the country church is co-extensive with that of the new agriculture and country life. The pastor must lead in all this." "There are four periods of country life in North America, coincident with Pioneer, Household, Speculative and Co-operative Farming. We are now just beginning to frame a period of speculative exploitation into a period of co-operative agricultural effort. The church has in this change its supreme opportunity to grasp new ideas of co-operation and to knit together the economic, intellectual, social and moral forces of the community until country life has been completely transformed."



REV. D. H. STEFFENS.

Surely this is an ambitious program, and I must confess that I sometimes wonder where it is all going to end. Is the study of agriculture, horticulture and animal husbandry to replace the study of Greek, Latin and history as a preparation for the study of theology? Is a knowledge of bacteriology to be considered of greater importance for the country minister than a knowledge of New Testament Greek? Shall he learn to fight insect pests and plant diseases rather than to fight sin and the forces of moral evil? Shall the country minister concern himself with the answer to the question, "What shall we eat, what shall we drink, wherewithal shall we be clothed?" rather than with the answer to that other question: "What shall I do to be saved?" Of course, nobody would seriously entertain or defend such a proposition. But in the face of this present discussion on the part to be played by the church and its ministry in this country life movement, which seems to include everything from killing potato bugs to the science of eugenics, a former country parson may be pardoned for asking himself how it is all to be accomplished and what the result is likely to be. If he has read any history he may remember that during the eighteenth century the intellectual movement which we call Rationalism in Germany, Deism in England and Infidelity in France so completely enthralled the hearts of men that country churches on Christmas Day were actually satisfied to have their ministers preaech to them "On the Advantages of Stallfeeding" because the Gospel speaks of a manger. The themes selected by some of the German preachers in those days are astounding. Thus one of them used the Gospel for Palm Sunday to warn his congregation against breaking branches from the trees of the government forests.

Now, I do not wish to imply that we are again tending in that direction, or that our country churches will ever again submit to such preaching. I desire merely to suggest that as we discuss the work of the rural church, it will be well for us to remember that this movement, like every other, may have its weaknesses and its dangers.

It is, for instance, not quite clear to me why the church is suddenly urged to completely transform country rather than city life. If there is any place where "the economic, intellectual, social and moral forces of a community need knitting together" it is the city rather than the country. In the country people are more or less compelled to associate with each other; in the city no man needs to know the people who live in the adjoining flat. The town-dweller can more completely isolate himself from all the interests and activities of community life than the countryman. His factory, his union, his shop, his office may represent his only point of contact with its economic forces. His evening paper, the moving-pictures, the theater or an occasional concert may represent his entire intellectual interests. His lodge, a pleasure club, a social party, or a visit make up his social life. His church, and when he is unfortunate, federated charities, represent his point of contact with its moral forces. Only in exceptional cases does he come into contact with people whose interests and views are not identical with his own. Constant movement in this narrow circle tends to limit his vision. Some of the most narrow people I ever met were New Yorkers whose entire knowledge of the world was gained by reading a newspaper, on the way to or from their work on the elevated or subway. To them, everything outside of New York was simply "country," a terra incognita somewhere beyond Hoboken or Jersey City. New York, which meant their factory, their tenement flat and their own little circle of acquaintances, was their universe. Every city is made up of an immense number of such disconnected circles and disjointed fragments. It has no real social fabric. It, no less than the country, needs knitting together. It is therefore not plain to me why the church should be urged to transform the country rather than the city.

As I see things, the social organization of the city stands as much in need of transformation as the open country. We felt this some years ago, and urged our candidates for the ministry to study sociology just as we are now urging them to study agriculture. The clerical sociologist and the institutional church have not yet succeeded in knitting together the disjointed members of our civic social organisms. Still, we are now called upon to adopt and carry out a program which would make the economic, intellectual, social and moral

THE ATTRACTIVE POWER OF CHRIST

*A SERMON BY WARREN G. PARTRIDGE, D.D.

TEXT: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." John 12: 32

THESE momentous words were spoken by our Lord only six days before Calvary. The scene marked a crisis in the career of our Master. The Greeks desire to see Jesus, and therein he has a vision of a whole world redeemed. He sees his cross in the center of human history. In his arrest, trial, and death, we can see the critical moment in the existence of the human race. Thoughtful men discover that this world is a momentous battlefield. The forces of good and evil wage a relentless and persistent war. Jesus, as he speaks these words, stands at the psychological moment in the battle, when the tide of conflict is turning in his favor. He sees his adversary broken, and the text is a promise of victory.

The splendid vocation of Jesus was to attract all mankind to himself. But his adversary, Satan, attempts to attract all men to his standard. There are two camps. Every human being must choose sides in this battlefield. We must enroll under the banner of Christ or Satan. We must choose, as our master and leader, either Jesus or his bitter foe. In every country, in the time of civil war, there is a life and death struggle for the reins of government. If it is a monarchy, the storm-center is the throne. The problem of every subject is, shall he be loyal to the reigning king, or will he throw his influence on the side of his adversary? In this life we must choose our king. Our loyalty is competed for. Two rulers contend for a kingdom. The line of battle encircles the globe in every generation; and men every day are rallying to one banner or the other. Some days the forces of evil seem to be winning the battle, but, in the course of years, we see that the truth, as it is in Jesus, is mighty and must prevail. Christ came into the world to be our King, and to lead us to heroic deeds. He came to enlist us in achievements worth while. Why are men attracted to him? His personality casts a spell over men. His sinless character is a powerful magnet for sinful men. He unveils the character of God, and makes that attractive. His magnificent mission attracts thousands of men. His program stirs the blood and appeals powerfully to the imagination. His grand program includes the conquest of the world.

The Leader's Magnificent Army

Here is a divine Leader that calls out all that is heroic in human nature. He seems audacious, as he undertakes to win the human race to his standard. But his audacity is captivating and compelling. Its very magnitude is attractive. Think of enrolling millions of men and women in world-wide evangelization! Multitudes hear, in his call, the will of God and the appeal of righteousness. World-wide missions is the slogan of his enthusiastic followers as they crowd around his banner. Men love a powerful leader, and here is a personality that captivates the imagination, subdues the will, dominates the intellect, and melts the affections. Thousands of martyrs have rushed to the stake to die for this commanding figure in human history. His influence was never so tremendous as it is this very hour. David Livingstone, John G. Paton, William Carey, Adoniram Judson, David Brainerd, Dr. Grenfell, and thousands of other heroic missionaries have been transfigured by his leadership and example, until they were anxious to flee to the remotest corners of the earth to win him disciples. Jesus' benefactions and sympathy for the poor and suffering have won him thousands of followers. His enthusiasm for humanity has been contagious. Men and women have flocked to his standard, attracted by his program of social uplift.

Multitudes of men and women to-day have "the mind of Christ" for the lost, the broken-hearted, the suffering, the poor, the ignorant, the weak, and the tempted. They enter into his benevolent views for the human race. Millions of dollars are flowing into his treasury every year, to found hospitals, asylums, rescue missions, churches, missions, schools, and universities, where his Gospel may have practical application. Multitudes make sacrifices of money, health, time, and even life itself, to carry forward his kingdom of love. There are various attractions in his person and in his message; but numberless followers feel the thrill of the great apostle who exclaimed, "For the love of Christ constraineth us." Paul was transformed by the attractive power of Christ, and he says, "I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." Our King has a magnificent program, and he needs all men to co-operate in his plans for the betterment of this world.

The Needs for the Campaign

Christ seeks a multitude of followers, so that he may have an irresistible army for the accomplishment of his purposes. Vast numbers are needed for his colossal plans. He needs an immense kingdom of redeemed men to achieve success. Our Master is seeking multitudes of followers, not for his sake, but for the good of the human race. His universal kingdom has a glorious destiny for mankind. Millions have been attracted to him because he is the Hope of this world. We are powerfully drawn to Christ because of what he has done and is doing for the cause of humanity. His program has emancipated millions of slaves. It has brought civil and religious liberty to many nations. It is eliminating ignorance, bigotry, and superstition in many benighted lands. It is bringing in the new day of international arbitration and peace. It is bringing about individual salvation and social salvation.

It is the leaven of civic righteousness, social uplift and good citizenship. It is the hope of social and industrial justice, and of equality of opportunity for all men. Will we take our place in his everlasting kingdom, and co-operate in all his plans for the redemption of mankind? When we accept Christ as our Master, we pass through the portals of his everlasting commonwealth to become his partners in every project to bless the world. Christ has a spiritual attraction, and those who respond to his potent spell become lovers of mankind. I have read a legend that there was once an immense mountain beside the sea, which was an irresistible magnet. Whenever a ship got within reach of its magnetic influence it was drawn helplessly to its doom. The attraction was so powerful that the bolts and nails flew out of the ship and rushed to the great magnet; and the ship rushed to the magnetic mountain and lay a mass of ruins on the rocks at its base. The attraction was absolutely compelling. Christ has the attraction of a colossal magnet in the whole world, but men can resist his potent influence and make shipwreck of their lives.

Christ, the Magnet of Humanity

Christ has established a universal kingdom. His religion is to supplant all other religions. It is a world-conquering religion, and he says: "I will draw all men unto me." Great rulers in the past have had visions of a universal empire. Alexander the Great seemed near realizing his ambition of a world-kingdom. But all such dreams of universal empire have been bitter disappointments. But Christ, some day, is to realize this dream of humanity. Every member of the human race needs him. All generations need his Gospel. Christianity is adapted to every individual and to every race of mankind. Christ attracted men of the first century, and he is powerfully attracting millions of men in the twentieth century. Christ has this attractive influence in all ages over the educated and the illiterate, the man, the woman, and the child, over the Oriental world and over the Occident. It will require time to build this kingdom of light and love. But it will be the one permanent result of human history.

Righteousness, justice and truth will ultimately prevail in the world. The whole world is destined to bow at the feet of Christ. Christ holds the key to the doors of human hearts. His spirit is in the world to act as a powerful searchlight, and to discover human sin. Men in their guilt must seek the face of God, and Christ is the open door to the Father's heart. Jesus is drawing men by inward conviction, not by outward coercion. He would "draw" men by the cords of love. Every day more statesmen, poets, thinkers, educators, and scientists are being swayed by Christ. Social workers in the tenements and slums are catching his passion of humanity. It was the cross of Jesus which was to sway the future. This was his throne, and the crucified One was to draw all men to become his loving and loyal subjects. Christ crucified and risen draws men by all the moral and spiritual influences of his kingdom.

The preaching of Christ, the work of the Holy Spirit, the influence of Christian homes, the molding of youth in Christian schools, the power of the Bible and Christian literature, and the example of daily Christian conduct "draw" men to him. We speak to-day of the "magnetic field." How far away will a piece of iron be influenced by a magnet? It depends upon the size of a magnet and its power. But the magnet does not draw the piece of iron if the latter is outside the magnetic field. Jesus is a spiritual magnet. How far can a man be away from him and yet feel his attractive power? The prodigal was in a "far country," but he felt even there the drawing power of love divine. The Master says, "I will draw all men unto me." No human being can ever be outside the magnetic field of Christ's loving heart. But any man can resist the power to his ruin. But Jesus to-day is drawing millions of hearts to him, and by his pierced hand he is welding the nations of the world into a spiritual kingdom. Christ's rule is inward. All our ideals, motives, and conduct must be governed by Christ. The circle of our Saviour's influence is growing larger every day. Satan is being daily cast out of human hearts. Some day the great gulf streams of human thought, feeling, and action will become Christian. Christ will one day have the heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession. The reign of Christ will supplant the ancient reign of Satan.

Christ's Drawing Power To-day

This heavenly drawing is not irresistible. Any man can insulate his heart and mind, and resist the divine attraction. A piece of iron cannot help flying to a powerful magnet when the two are brought close together. But the human will can resist the spiritual attraction of God and Christ. But multitudes of people respond to the drawing power of Christ, and he will have an innumerable throng around him, as the center of the universe. This divine attraction is operating powerfully every moment of time on the whole human race. I have read of a company of soldiers who had an electric battery in camp, and they wound a coil of wire around a big cannon, and turned on the electric current; and they transformed the cannon into an immense and mighty magnet. Then the soldiers stood some distance away and held big cannon balls, swords, and muskets in their hands and wondered, as they saw these heavy objects fly out of their hands and adhere to the powerful magnet.

Jesus is a spiritual magnet of such omnipotent power that nations as well as individuals are drawn to him; and some day battlefields will disappear, and armies will lay down their cannonballs, muskets, and swords at Jesus' feet. "And nations shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruninghooks, and they shall learn war no longer." Our Redeemer was a true prophet and he said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."

The cross of Christ has wonderful attractive power. As the Master spoke of how he would draw men unto himself, he said, "If I be lifted up." His death on the cross would accomplish what his life could not accomplish. He knew that there would be in his death a more heavenly spell, a more absolute and potent influence to transform human character than even in his wonderful miracles and teachings, or in the sinless purity of his daily life. When he laid down his life for sinners, it was the uttermost

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, June 1. Psalm 133. True unity is like a perfume which lends its fragrance to everything. The "precious ointment" gave its grateful scent to Aaron's head, and his beard, and "to the skirts of his garments." And so it is with the grace of spiritual communion; it makes even commonplaces beautiful. When the spirit of union prevails in a family it hallows ordinary speech, and it makes the household meal a sacrament. "There is fragrance all around, when there's love at home." And it is even so with the fellowship of a church: its unity makes common service glorious. Discord ravages everything, it spoils every feast, and even the most delicious food becomes bitter or insipid. But saints in unity taste the "hidden manna" in life's daily bread.

And unity is also like the dew which rested upon the herbage of Hermon. Every blade of grass had its own shining presence, and every blade was fellow to every other blade in possessing the gentle refreshment of God's bounty. In brotherly unity the tender dews of God's grace rest upon every soul, rich and poor, learned and ignorant, prominent and obscure. No faculty is imperiled with the fever heat of passion, or with the equally fierce glare of unholy pride. The "still dews of quietness" are over everything, and the powers of the soul move in cool communion.

Beautiful is the life that finds its symbols in fragrance and dew. It means that Eden is being recovered, that paradise is regained.

MONDAY, June 2. Genesis 45: 1-15. "It was not you that sent me hither, but God." How gracious and magnanimous! Joseph hides the cruelty of his brethren behind the glory of God's wonderful grace. He cannot see their sin because of the vision of divine providence. Sometimes we cannot see things because "the sun is so strong!" We use our hands for a shade, and we shut off some of the bright light, and then hidden things come into view. The sense of God's goodness so blazed round about Joseph as to put out of sight his brothers' envy and hatred, and all the dark conspiracy of past days. Misunderstandings were swallowed up in the fulness of divine love and grace.

All this unfolds a great attainment in the life of the soul. It is beautiful when we dwell so intimately in the "burning bliss" of the eternal Light that the faults and failings of our brethren are cast into the shade. Surely we may test our spiritual progress by measures such as these? When other people's faults and weaknesses stand out in vivid intensity we are not living in the light of God's love; we are rather living in the light of our own conceit. When we begin to see the gifts and graces in our brother's life, the flowers growing in the wilderness, then we may rest assured that we are catching "the way of God," and in his light we are seeing light.

TUESDAY, June 3. Genesis 45: 6-28. "And it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants." They were caught in Joseph's joy, and their own hearts kindled with delight. It is amazing how contagious are joy and kindness! One kindly presence can turn mourning into dancing. Who has not had painful experience of a company whose "genial currents" seemed to be frozen? All was cold, stiff, reserved, and artificial. Then some bright, cheerful, overflowing soul enters the room, and lo! "the winter is past," everybody is irradiated, and the birds of good spirits begin to sing! It is the contagion of joyfulness. "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine." The joyful kindness of Joseph sent springtime throughout the palace, and "it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants."

Robert Louis Stevenson, in one of his incomparable essays, proclaims "the duty of joy." It is a strange phrase, for joy, like love, seems to live far from the highway of duty and commandments. And yet it is right. It is in our power to obtain a kindly and joyful disposition. There are ministries and processes by which the finest graces can be grown. We can foster jealousy, or we can foster good will. We can nourish melancholy, or we can nourish hope. We can welcome bitterness, or we can welcome joy. If the bright graces come within our power, then it is our duty to possess them. They all abide in God, and we can be his friends, and share the things which dwell in his presence.

WEDNESDAY, June 4. Genesis 46: 1-7. "Fear not to go down into Egypt . . . I will go down with thee." That is the assurance which drives fears away like dark birds of the night! The divine Presence transforms any road. Who has not known a monotonous stretch of highway transformed by strong and interesting company? A friend can grace a wilderness. How much more is it so with "the Friend that sticketh closer than a brother"! "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose."

And therefore the main consideration in life is not the road but our company. If our fellowships are sweet then in passing through "the valley of Baca" we shall "make it a well." And the supreme Friendship, before which every other friendship grows pale, is that of our blessed Lord. In his companionship we can go on the uncertain journey to Egypt and not be afraid. We can take any appointed road, in the happy assurance that there will be lights all along the way. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me."

And so the Friend really makes the road. Our circumstances may change, but he abides. And where he is there is rest and heaven. "Through cloud and sunshine, Lord, abide with me.'"

THURSDAY, June 5. II Corinthians 5: 5-11. "The love of Christ constraineth us." And that word "constraineth" is very strong and picturesque. It means to lay an arresting grip upon one, as of an officer taking a man into custody! It means to get round about one, and to carry him forward as in the irresistible momentum of a vast crowd! And that is how Paul felt the love of Christ. It arrested him and held him in strongest yet in sweetest bonds. It surrounded him like a thronging multitude, and carried him almost off his feet! He could not resist it. It was overwhelming!

I do not wonder that, in the strength of that tremendous constraint, the apostle believed that he could "do all things." Yes, in the power of his Saviour's love he could even forgive his enemies! He could offer flowers to those who had stoned him. He could take ministries of goodness to those who hated him. He could carry the burdens of those who had tried to break his heart. In the love of Christ he could do the impossible!

And we, too, may live in the same mighty constraint. We can harness the power of infinite love to our daily tasks. We can experience its "pull" and its "lift" at the "steep and stony hill." It will keep us sweet amid reproaches. Our milk of kindness will not be soured in "the dark and cloudy day." We shall be able to be gracious to the graceless, for "our sufficiency is of Christ."

FRIDAY, June 6. Matthew 5: 38-48. "Love your enemies." The Lord's commandments are just the obverse sides of his promises. The duty is equaled by grace. If he commands us to a certain expenditure we may be sure the money is in the bank. If we are ordered on a journey all provision has been made for the road. God's commissions are always "personally conducted," and nothing is neglected or overlooked. For every obligation there is a corresponding inspiration. For every demand there is adequate resource.

So that when the Lord commands us to love it is clear proof there is love in the bank on which we can draw in our necessity. "We love because he first loved us." In the fountain of his love we have an inexhaustible supply. In "the grace of the Lord Jesus" we can become gracious. In "the compassion of Jesus" we can be pitiful. In the forgiveness which we have in Jesus we can forgive our fellow men. We can reveal what we have first received. Our river is born at the eternal springs.

It is idle, therefore, to seek to "work ourselves up" into love. We must receive it as a gift from the hands of God. We must ask for his gift of love as we ask for his gift of bread. "Give us this day our daily love." And his love will make us loving and lovely, and we shall be able to meet even our enemies with the love-gifts of grace and benediction.

SATURDAY, June 7. Psalm 103: 1-12. "Who forgiveth all thine iniquities." God's holy forgiveness wipes out a dark record. It is blotted out of the "book of remembrance" and God retains the thought of our sin no more forever. But God's forgiveness not only washes out the record of our sin, it cleanses us from the defilement of its guilt—like a boat that is taken into dry dock and cleansed from all the hindering encrustments, weeds, and barnacles that have gathered about her in her journeyings.

"Who healeth all thy diseases." Even when guilt is forgiven the soul may be sorely diseased by reason of its sin. But, when God forgives, the forces of grace have the ascendancy, and all the ailing and broken powers begin to recover their moral and spiritual health. Habits are changed, the habits of looking, listening, speaking. A new climate is round about us; our spirits breathe their native air; we find ourselves in a new world. The "saving health" of the Father is imparted to his children.

"Who redeemeth thy life from destruction." We are no longer the property of the evil one. We are like slaves who have been redeemed from captivity, and we have found a new Master. The forces that move about us are no longer destructive; they are ministers of grace, and like the powers of the springtime they woo every hidden power into strength and beauty.

God's wonderful forgiveness brings the soul from wintry bondage into spiritual warmth and glory, and crowns the life "with lovingkindness and tender mercies."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913

THE ATTRACTIVE POWER OF CHRIST

the Son of God could possibly do to show his infinite love and devotion to the sons of men. Nothing is loftier than self-sacrifice. He said himself, "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends." But he laid down his life just as willingly for his bitterest foes. Here we see the marvelous attractiveness of the cross. Christ was not simply a hero or a martyr, but he was God's representative, and man's representative. His cross has divine attraction because his death was more than human self-sacrifice and human heroism.

"God is love," and the cross of Christ is the climax of divine compassion for sinful men. Such love melts the hardest hearts, and softens the most stubborn wills, and captivates the most bitter intellects. The cross of Christ draws and attracts us to God. It reveals the tender compassion of the divine Father.

The apostles, in the first century, seemed like men driven by a superhuman dynamic force. In the twentieth century reformers, evangelists, teachers, missionaries, social and settlement workers, preachers, and thousands of laymen have become crusaders in the titanic battles to usher in the kingdom of heaven upon earth. Money is given to Christ and to his cause as never before witnessed in the world. Young men and women are offering themselves in larger numbers than ever before for home and foreign missions. Tens of thousands are saying every day, "What can I do to-day, so that I can follow in the steps of my sinless Lord?"

ATLANTA'S SUNDAY SCHOOL PARADE

THE SECOND BAPTIST AND FIRST CHRISTIAN SUNDAY SCHOOLS OF ATLANTA, GA., ASSEMBLED AT THE STATE CAPITOL, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 4

THERE were six thousand three hundred and nineteen enrolled Sunday school students of all ages in the parade Sunday morning, May 4, when the Second Baptist Sunday school of Atlanta, Ga., and the First Christian Sunday school of that city marched through its streets from the State capitol, on whose grounds they met, to the public auditorium, to hold their joint meeting and jubilation just before the end of the three months' contest between them.

Included in that number was the Sunday school which had set a new world's record for attendance—the First Christian school, with 4,129 scholars, all regularly enrolled, and including 776 new ones who had joined that morning. The previous world's record was said to have been 3,800, held by the Christian Sunday school of Canton, Ohio, champion among the schools of all denominations in the entire United States and Canada.

The standing of the two schools in the Atlanta contest, announced with their morning's record included after they had convened their joint meeting, was as follows: First Christian, 55,344; Second Baptist, 48,086 points. The contest had but one more Sunday to go before its end. Notwithstanding the apparent certainty that they had won, there was no exuberance on that score among the scholars of the First Christian Church at the mass meeting. "We've both won," they insisted. The prize, a picnic from loser to winner, will be nothing less than a joint jubilation of the two schools, with each bringing full baskets—for that spirit is in control of their policies.

A further contest, beginning just where the original ends, was broached and practically agreed upon between the leaders of the two schools. The purpose of the second contest will be to furnish an incentive in each school for retaining all that it has gained by the first engagement, in which new scholars were the premium and promptness and attendance were made to count.

At the beginning of the first contest, the Second Baptist Church, much the larger of the two schools, gave a handicap of over 2,000 points to the First Christian. The average attendance of each school for the preceding three months had been around 400. The First Christian school seized an advantage at once in seeking new scholars, and so won a lead which the Second Baptist workers could not overtake. "We have had a broader field to work in," explained C. V. LeCraw, superintendent of the Christian school. "There is but one other church of our denomination in Atlanta, and we have had the whole city to draw our new membership from, whereas the Baptists have been handicapped in this regard by the fact that theirs is but one of a number of Baptist congregations in Atlanta." AS LONG AS THE HILL STANDS

BY CAROLINE WOOD MORRISON AND JANE MORRISON

A Story Complete in This Issue

JUST a little beyond the Burke farm rose a lone, precipitous hill. David Burke, as a little boy in calico trousers and stiff waist, luxuriated, barefoot, in the warm dust of it, swinging his carpetbag school satchel and trudging up the crest, a happy atom on the top of the wave of life. The boy was affected, as by drugged wine, by the scent of earth when fields are feeling the caress of little growing fingers on their brown, still flesh, and trees look companionably, even conversationally, towards crooked fence and blackberry bush. Subconsciously he was a dreamer, though physically alert to the most timid bird's flight, the scurrying of a rabbit, the whisk of a squirrel's gray flare of fur.

Over the hill lived the Fennels, a family of "poor whites." David, preoccupied in his own concerns, had but a vague consciousness of the swarm of children in the gray, unpainted cabin and the gaunt woman on the porch watching her flock off to school.

There never were shoes or dresses enough for all the Fennels. Little Jimmy, the only boy, sometimes took his turn in an elder sister's high-heeled slippers while a younger sister covered her shoulders with his outgrown coat. Mrs. Fennel had obstinate, fighting blood in her veins. Few men would have suffered the sting of humiliation and extra toil that this woman endured that she might secure her children "book learning." She managed so that some of the Fennels—steps of tousled heads—drifted schoolward each day.

David was taught, "You must never play with the Fennels, never, so long as the hill stands."

This was his mother's fetish—"So long as the hill stands"—her measurement of the everlasting. She had been born in the large farmhouse where she still lived. She, too, had passed over the hill summer and winter to school. She remembered it, bathed in moonlight, on her betrothal night. It stood to her for the unchangeable. When David crossed the hill at evening, the white road lying like a trail to the sky, the warm light undulating in ebbing waves from the fence line, the wide-eaved barn, the homeward-bound teams, made his little heart under the starched waist-line swell with a sense of elation. His father was a silent, undemonstrative man. The mother was the child's companion. Sitting in her lap, or following her about, feeding chickens and wee calves, gathering vegetables in the flower-sweet garden, he had no sense of loneliness.

The days seemed to him to be a succession of passing over the hill and returning in the evening. It was the way to school, to town, to church. And when he had gone over the hill a great many times he was sixteen, and it was evening, and his mother and he rode over the hill alone, leaving his father forever on the other side.

At first the boy was astonished as the happiness he had thought the usual atmosphere of life eluded him. Sorrow and new cares crowded out the long, sweet hours of delight. He became, suddenly, a man. He drove the calves he had petted to slaughter, directed the shearing, revived the dairy that had fallen off during his father's failing health. The Fennel boy, red-headed and stoical, was employed to drive the milk wagon.

One evening David—he was twenty years old that day—sought a stray heifer across the hill. The white warm road, the red gash of the gulley, the brown of sleeping fields, as softly the eyelids of evening mist were closing over them, stirred half-forgotten memories of happiness. Down the road some one was singing

> Daisies and buttercups bring I to you,
> Daisies and buttercups sparkling in dew.

David leaned forward, peering at the singer under his hand. The girl, swinging a school satchel by a long strap, her sunbonnet hanging by one string, made a pretty picture with her big-eyed oval face in its clustering dark hair. The young man felt a breath of the lost happiness on his cheek—the old spiritual self-satisfaction of four years ago. He did not understand, but he stood and waited.

Presently he realized that this was the youngest Fennel girl. The others had married or found employment in the city. The drunken father was "out of his cups" at last and Mrs. Fennel, with her son's steady wage to be depended on, saw that she had done well to make a stand in the last ditch. There was meat on her table—even cake of a Sunday—and Kinnie, the baby, represented the achievement of her life's struggle, ambition, aim, for Kinnie was to graduate in June.

"Hello, Kinnie!" said David.

The girl caught her under lip between teeth that were white as milk. The unexpected greeting, which was like a hail, first thrilled, then frightened her. She began to run up the hill.

"Is anything happened to Jimmy?" she panted.

"I—don't—know," stammered David, confused.

The wind blew her bonnet quite away to show her beautiful hair, blew the over-long skirt backwards like a wing bearing her onwards. Looking into his face she felt her anxiety recede. David put out his hand and took her books.

"Do you like to learn about strange places?" he questioned idly as he opened the dilapidated geography.

"Yes, oh, yes. I have always wanted to go to them. I—" Her young voice trailed to silence. Why were the words not true now? A few moments ago she had wanted rebelliously to go away, to seek some of those far-off places described by the book—but not now!

A half-grown dog, frisking after his master, snatched her fallen sunbonnet and made off with it.

"Oh, my bonnet!" she cried.

David uttered a sharp command, but the puppy

IN THE LAND OF THE ASTRACHAN

BY LIEUTENANT COLONEL ALFRED HEINICKE

A CARAVAN OF $100,000 WORTH OF LAMBSKINS STARTING FOR THE FRONTIER

EXAMINING THE SKINS AFTER THEY HAVE BEEN IN PICKLE

WASHING THE SKINS IN RUNNING WATER AFTER LEAVING THE SALT MIXTURE

IN THE Shah-in-Shah's country, far away across the seas in southern Persia, the astrachan trade has its origin. Before the little lambskins became valuable in the eyes of the fashionable world, all Persians wore hats of real astrachan, but nowadays the genuine skins have become so expensive that only the wealthiest of the people can afford to use them. The poorer classes wear either caps of felt or imitation lambskin hats made of cotton woven and imported from Europe.

In bygone times the real hats were tall and straight like long stovepipes, and in old Persian paintings this form of headgear takes a prominent place, for no man had his portrait painted without his tall hat. Even at the present day every Persian puts on his lambskin kollah when he leaves his bed in the morning, and wears it all day, not even removing it when he enters a house, for instead of uncovering the head, Persians remove their shoes on entering a room.

The finest lambskins were formerly obtained from the unborn lamb, by sacrificing both mother and young, for by this cruel and extravagant method the fine curls of the jet-black wool were preserved unopened, and the beautiful glossy sheen on the wool was preserved intact.

Little by little the lambskins became more and more important in the Persian export trade. Russia was naturally the first foreign country to buy them, and for this reason most of the skins still find their way to Europe through Russian dealers, the big furriers in London, Paris, Leipzig and New York supplying their wants every year at the great fair at Nijni Novgorod. Only the skins bought in this market are considered genuine astrachan, and nobody will buy skins which do not bear the Russian stamp.

The keen Caucasians, who are the most enterprising dealers, visit Persia year after year. Some of them, indeed, have settled in the South, where their chief buying center is Shiraz in Farsistan.

The Arabs and Gashkais, the most powerful and numerous tribes in Southern Persia, bring immense flocks of sheep each spring and autumn to the Shiraz market. The Russian dealers pay large sums in advance to the various chieftains, and deliveries of forty thousand or fifty thousand lambskins at one time are of frequent occurrence. Many odd lambs are also brought into town every day during the season by the village people living near Shiraz.

Sturdy copper-brown nomads walk from shop to shop with lambs slung over their shoulders, offering them to the highest bidder. As soon as the bargain is struck, the breeder whips out his knife, kills and skins the lamb on the spot, hands over the pelt and walks off with the cash and the flesh, which he sells to some passerby. Keen competition and the ever-increasing demand from the Western markets have put up prices year by year. Perfect skins with the finest curls and glossy sheen cost at present from $4 to $5 a pair; the cheapest fetch as much as $2 to $2.50 a pair.

In making a cloak or cape of fine quality, the center of the saddle only is used and a very large number of such strips, perfectly matched in curl and degree of blackness, are stitched together to make up a complete garment. The rest of the skins, the legs, sides and other inferior parts, are used for less important purposes, such as linings for gloves, shoes and other articles. In classing the various skins the jet-black ones are considered the best. The gray ones are also used in their natural color, but the fawn-colored skins are generally dyed black and used in Persia, though now a large number of dyed skins are also prepared for export. Prices are so high that even inferior skins fetch good sums from the dealers.

Besides the first cost of the skins as they come from the lambs' backs, several other items go to increase the cost to the wearer. There are, for instance, the expenses of preparing the pelts for transport and the mule freight from Shiraz to Resht, some sixty to seventy days' journey by caravan, a very heavy item. The continually increasing taxes levied by the Persian Government for permission to export the skins must not be forgotten in calculation. Every now and then the wily Persian Government puts an embargo on the skins, the ostensible reason being the ever-increasing price of meat for food, but this is only an excuse, the real object being to squeeze as much money as possible out of the dealers, for bribery plays a very large part in the astrachan trade.

The smart Caucasian merchants are quite sufficiently wide-awake to deal with the wily Persian officials, but before the skins reach their destination, about 40 per cent., even 50 per cent., has been added to their actual purchase price. The skins are packed in bales containing from one hundred to one hundred and fifty pairs, and a mule carries two of such bales. Caravans bearing as many as two hundred loads, or 400 bales, representing a value of from $40,000 to $75,000, leave Shiraz at one time, and as the goods travel perforce uninsured to the northern frontier the dealers are always very anxious until they have reached Resht in safety.

In 1912 about 180,000 pairs of skins, worth 1,250,000 rubles ($700,000), were exported from Shiraz alone. Before they are packed into bales the skins undergo a very careful and lengthy preparation to preserve them. They leave Persia in the salted state, the final tanning being done in Europe. The preliminary cleaning is done in running water to get rid of impurities on the fleshy side of the skins, which are scraped with long, blunt-edged knives. Then follows the salting, which is done in large tanks or earthen vessels, capable of holding three hundred to five hundred skins each. There they are thoroughly steeped in a mixture of salt, barley flour and water. After remaining in this pickle for ten to fourteen days, the skins are taken out one by one and spread on a table, where they are again carefully examined and scraped. This finished, they are laid out in the sun to dry for twelve hours or so, by which time they are bone-dry but very dirty, for the flour and water have formed a paste and the fine curls are all stuck together and full of lumps, to get rid of which the skins are once more washed in running water by men standing kneedeep in the stream.

After being thoroughly rinsed and well shaken, the skins are placed woolly side on the hot pebbles in the river bed, and before they have time to dry hard they are sprinkled all over with a thin coating of fine barley flour. At sunset they are taken up and handed over to the classers for sorting according to quality and color. Each skin is stamped with the mark indicating its quality and color, and they are then stacked in pairs, wool against wool, and tied round the legs with red string, after which they are ready for making up into bales. The bulk of the skins are exported, but those which are to be used locally are tanned in Shiraz.

The mode of Persian headgear has altered considerably. In days gone by the hats were very tall and heavy, but now the most fashionable are quite low. The middle classes still wear a hat ten inches high of melon-shaped form, but the most aristocratic members of society prefer a hat only five inches high with straight sides, for which they will pay as much as $10 or $15. Commoner hats of coarser wool are to be had for about $2 to $2.50. The poor folk, for whom this is too expensive, wear the less costly felt cap.

It is said that a real lambskin kollah, like the genuine Panama, lasts more than a lifetime, and descends from father to son, or is the subject of special bequest to some valued relation.

The Latest Bible Discovery

THE church and the world are hailing the publication of the latest great find of Gospel manuscripts. Mr. Charles L. Freer of Detroit, Mich., has recently sent to the chief libraries and universities of the world fac-simile copies of the manuscript discovered in Egypt six years ago, which he later purchased. Accounts of the discovery were published at the time it was made, but the judgment of the world of scholars was reserved until the whole text could be observed and investigated. This is now possible, and the indications are that the new manuscript will rank as one of the most ancient known to be in existence. It is said to date from the fourth or fifth century, and thus may be found to be of equal antiquity with the two oldest known manuscripts, the Sinaiticus and the Vaticanus, both of which are assigned to the middle of the fourth century.

It is interesting to note that in the new manuscript the order of the Gospels is changed, the sequence being Matthew, John, Luke, Mark. The most striking feature of the Freer manuscript is the appearance of a number of verses near the end of the Gospel of Mark which do not occur in any other manuscript. There has always been a great perplexity about this particular portion of the New Testament because in the most ancient and authoritative manuscripts the last verses of the last chapter of Mark are missing. Later manuscripts contain an appendix which has been incorporated into the English translations; in the Revised versions, these last verses are detached from the rest of the book. The new verses occurring in the Freer manuscript are believed to have been known to Jerome, who quotes part of them in his writings. They come after the fourteenth verse, in which Christ upbraids his disciples for their unbelief and hardness of heart, and are as follows:

"And they excused themselves, saying that this age of lawlessness and unbelief is under Satan, who through the agency of unclean spirits suffers not the true power of God to be apprehended.

"For the cause, said they unto Christ, reveal now at once thy righteousness.

"And Christ said unto them, The limit of the years of the power of Satan is [not] fulfilled, but it draweth near.

"For the sake of those that have sinned was I given up unto death, that they may return unto the truth and sin no more, but may inherit the spiritual and incorruptible glory of righteousness in heaven."

Nearly four thousand ancient Scripture manuscripts are now in existence. New discoveries will doubtless be made. Meanwhile the Word of God is being engraved on the hearts and minds of his people all over the world; the Bible continues to be, beyond all comparison, the most widely read book; and every new discovery tends to substantiate the firm facts of the Christian faith.

Two Views of the California Case

IN VIEW of the prevalent agitation in California over Japanese land ownership, it is interesting to know just how much land these aliens control in that State at the present time. An educated Japanese, Kiyoshi K. Kawakami, writing in the Independent, sums up their holdings, viz.: 8,000 acres in northern San Joaquin Valley, 7,000 in southern San Joaquin Valley, and 2,000 in Sacramento Valley—17,000 acres in all. When it is understood that the two great valleys first named contain over 166,000 square miles of arable land, the Japanese holdings, according to Mr. Kawakami's view, are altogether too small to constitute a menace to the State's agricultural industries. Besides, these valleys, being lowlands, damp and frequently inundated, were shunned by immigrants and other cultivators and the Japanese developed them when they were practically neglected. He points out that no less than thirty-four anti-Japanese bills have been introduced in the present session of the State legislature, "all aimed at curbing the rights of the Japanese, which are obviously guaranteed by treaty." These measures provide for increasing the license fee of Japanese fishermen from $10 to $100 a year; for the segregation of Japanese school children; the prohibition of liquor licenses to Japanese; prohibiting them from using power engines; establishing a special poll tax upon them; prohibiting them from employing white women; prohibiting them from acquiring title to or owning land or real property. These bills do not mention the Japanese by name, but as "aliens not eligible to citizenship."

Mr. Kawakami's recital of the situation is instructive, but it should also be stated that the treaty, while allowing Japanese to own or lease land and buildings for trade or manufacturing purposes, confers no right to occupy land for agricultural purposes. It is reasonable to assume that this omission was not unintentional. All the anti-Japanese measures before the Legislature deal not with trade or manufacture but with land held for agricultural purposes, and this is especially so in the latest bill, which was the object of Secretary Bryan's visit to Sacramento. The Californians claim that as only land held for agricultural purposes will be affected, it cannot be shown that the rights given under the treaty are impaired or abridged in any degree. This attitude makes the whole question at issue one of treaty interpretation, which can only be satisfactorily passed upon by the Supreme Court, or possibly by the Hague Tribunal, should Japan wish the matter committed to arbitration.

Vacation Time

AS THE season of summer outing draws near, when mountain, seashore and valley resorts reap their annual golden harvest from the multitudes in search of recreation and physical reinvigoration, it is well to give heed to the timely note of warning that has been issued by several Health Boards which are co-operating in sanitary effort. Health Commissioner Lederle of New York, who may be accepted as an authority on sanitation, cautions vacationists to make sure of three things if they desire to benefit physically by their summer outing, viz., that the drinking water supply is pure, that the milk served at meals is uncontaminated, and that the place is not fly-infested as the result of carelessness in the kitchen, unclean stables, or objectionable surroundings. Impure water, bad milk and flies are the three greatest typhoid-breeders. Of the 1,000,000 or more cases of typhoid occurring annually in the United States, a very considerable proportion is traceable to unhygienic conditions at rural resorts, although they do not usually develop until the victim is back in town after vacation. As the young are especially liable to this insidious danger, too much care cannot be exercised by parents and guardians. Absolute cleanliness is the latest word in science, and the summer camp, hotel or boarding-house, however attractive the surroundings, which makes no adequate effort to protect its guests from the dangers mentioned, cannot be patronized without positive peril.

The Recall of Judge Weller

THAT the recall is not the dangerous innovation pictured by Senator Root, by which "the people, if they get the power, will strike down and degrade all just and righteous members of the judiciary," but an instrument which can be used intelligently to serve the ends of justice, has been convincingly shown in the case of Judge Charles L. Weller, a police magistrate of San Francisco. His methods of dealing with crimes against morality, and especially with regard to offenses against womanhood, aroused the women of San Francisco, who formed a Recall League to oust him from office, which they have succeeded in doing, electing his opponent, Wiley F. Crist, by a small majority. It is generally conceded that they waged a fair campaign, in which the offending magistrate was fought as the representative of an evil judicial system rather than personally. It was an uphill battle and powerful local interests, including the Bar Association, opposed the women; but as the press of San Francisco frankly admits, the people themselves were convinced "that the honor of womanhood is more important than any judge," and they voted accordingly. The case will stand as a precedent and should be a wholesome reminder to other judges who, through a desire to serve partisan or personal interests, may be tempted to abuse their official position in favor of influential or protected criminals.

The Banner Over the Work

WE PASSED a square on one of the New York streets where a number of old houses had been demolished and removed, and preparations were being made for the erection of an enormous building on the site. Down many feet below the street level men were at work, carting away dirt and hauling blocks of granite into the empty space. They were very common-looking men—rough, unskilled day-laborers. But there was a lofty flagpole standing in the midst of the great lot, and a flag floating at the top of it bore the names of the firm of rich merchants by whose order a vast structure is to stand on that spot. What could it matter to those men at their humble toil whether they dug away the rubbish for the foundation, or laid the copestone of the finished structure? The same banner would float over all the workmen, all the way up; the banner that meant authority for building and reward for faithful labor. And if we could see now with the eyes we shall have by and by, the places that we call lowly and the work we think hardly worth while would stand out before us in amazing grandeur as contributing to superstructures of eternal glory. A hundred years from now, it will not be known who were the wagoners, or who was the architect of the most splendid structure in New York. And what difference do you suppose the angels see between the work of Wesley, Spurgeon or Moody, and the work of that little child over there—when they look at the whole mighty kingdom which has been building for thousands of years—except only the difference in faithfulness? And that difference may be in favor of the child.

One banner floats over all the workmen, and it means no more for the greatest than for the least.

Centennial Peace Delegates' Reception

THE peace delegates who are arranging plans for the great centennial celebration began with a visit to the mayor of New York and have had rounds of receptions in New York, Boston, Philadelphia. Washington, Chicago and other cities. The one at the Hotel Astor in New York was of great significance. Joseph H. Choate was the toastmaster and a distinguished company sat down at the banquet. Secretary of State W. J. Bryan made an eloquent speech, claiming to have been sent by President Wilson to voice the nation's desire for and determination to preserve peace. Among other things Mr. Bryan said:

The moral standards of the world are being lifted up, and the world's conception of brotherhood is a conception growing more definite and more clear year after year. There is a greater sense of kinship among men than there ever was before. There is more altruism on this earth than this earth has previously known. Every year the number of those increases who recognize that they are linked by indissoluble bands to all other people. And with this understanding of the meaning of universal brotherhood peace makes progress.

Lord Weardale, head of the British delegation, made an able address in which he referred in beautiful terms to the peace between Canada and the United States. Sir Edmund Walker, head of the Canadian delegation, made most appropriate remarks. Dr. Albert Shaw, chairman of the Publicity Committee of the National Peace Centenary Committee, has made public the manifesto adopted by the international conferees. The proclamation concludes:

We are, therefore, encouraged to hope that the development of letters, science and the arts, of commerce, industry and finance, of mutual knowledge, trust and good feeling on the part of those who owe different allegiances and who speak different tongues may profitably absorb the energies of mankind, as well as offer opportunity for the display of the noblest and finest fruits of mind and character.

We respectfully request His Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and the Secretary of State of the United States to transmit this invitation through the proper official channels to the governments of the world, in order that both by the participation of governments and by the co-operation of men of good will in every land this celebration may be so carried out as to mark not merely the close of one hundred years of peace between English-speaking peoples but the opening of what we sincerely trust will be a fresh era of peace and good will between all the nations.

THE DELEGATES TO THE PEACE CENTENNIAL CONFERENCE WITH MAYOR GAYNOR OF NEW YORK ON THE STEPS OF THE CITY HALL

Plans have been practically completed by the delegates for the International Centennial Celebration. Two monuments, identical in design and inscription, are to be erected in Washington and London, and the cornerstones are to be laid at the same moment by the King and the President, with a brief cessation of all business simultaneously in both countries. Other plans are contemplated, such as the institution of traveling scholarships, the preparation of a new history of the one hundred years of peace, and the building of befitting monuments along the Canada boundary line. One of those looked upon with most favor is a splendid new memorial bridge across the Niagara River. The world is moving so swiftly upward, manward, and Godward, that it is hard to keep up with the pace. This centennial celebration will help to usher in the kingdom of God in the era of peace proclaimed by the angels, in whose anthem the civilized world will join:

Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. (Luke 2: 14.)

Killed Hunting Birds' Eggs

MR. WILLIAM CRISPIN, a scientist of Salem, N. J., was found dead at the foot of cliffs that rise 700 feet above the Delaware River near Narrowsville, the other day. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences of Philadelphia and had taken a deep interest in gathering eggs of rare birds. He went to the cliffs of Nockami in search of the eggs of some rock hawks that made their nests there. He took a rope 400 feet long to the top of the cliffs, tied it to a tree, and let himself down some 300 feet to a ledge. It is thought that he slipped there and fell to his death, as his lifeless body was found by two young ladies of Riegelsville under the rope that hung several hundred feet above him. We have here another one in the long line of martyrs to science. Some of the best thoughts in nature have been secured not only by the persistency, industry and consecration, but also by the sacrifices of the devotees of science. There are few great discoveries or inventions that have not cost their toll of lives in experimentation. In the pursuit of any life plan there are dangers at every step. In the mill, the shop, the store, the office; in the crowded streets, with whirling wheels; on the ship or train, there are perils everywhere, some of which can be guarded against by prudence; others are a part of the lot of human life. These are typical of the dangers in the spiritual world. There are many that slip from the ledges and fall a long way to the rocks below. The lesson most important to be learned, and which most people refuse to consider, is that of the insecurity of human life as illustrated in the fall of the scientist, and as thus expressed by David:

There is but a step between me and death. (I Sam. 20: 3.)

Wood Becomes Precious Stone

WOOD, under the chemistry of time and the elements of nature, has often turned to stone, but it does not often turn into precious stones, as in the deposits of the Western parts of the United States. There are deposits of wood turned into opal in Nevada, which is manufactured into jewelry, specimens of which are on the market in New York and other cities. The new jewel consists of petrified wood, the fiber of which has been gradually replaced by particles of the silicate called opal. It is of dark red and blue shades, with many flashes of color through it. In the sunlight the stone has a fascinating play of hues. Opalescent wood is used for pendants, brooches, rings, etc. In appearance it rivals the precious opals that have been found in Hungary. These opals from Nevada are cut with a convex surface in order to bring out the play of colors. There is an old belief that the opal brings good luck to the one wearing it. Some people from the most primitive and homely beginnings by the alchemy of time and thoughts and sentiments have been transformed into beautiful characters adorned with the precious jewels of wisdom and virtue. The value of this precious jewel of wisdom, which guarantees to its wearer the good fortune of both worlds, is thus described by the wise man:

She is more precious than rubies; and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her. (Prov. 3: 15.)

Counted Sister "Sacred Legacy"

A RETIRED naval officer, living in Brooklyn, had a maiden sister, who was dependent on him solely for support. He had such intense affection for her and such a keen sense of his responsibility for her support that he sent home to her every cent of his savings for deposit for that purpose. The sister died the other day, leaving an estate of $83,900, which her brother had laid away for her during forty years. The brother's testimony, given at the instance of the transfer tax appraiser, showed that he made the first deposit in 1874 and continued till his sister's death, having deposited $16,000 of his retirement pay since 1899. He contracted a disease while on service in China, which he felt sure would end his life, and his care was that should death come to him first his sister should have enough to keep her in ease the rest of her days. He told the tax appraiser that he held his sister as a "sacred legacy." The sister left a will by which $20,000 went to the brother outright, and also the proceeds of the remaining $63,000, all at his death to go to two hospitals in Washington, $60,000 to the Garfield, and $20,000 to the Emergency Hospital. The picture of the devotion of this manly man to his sister and his tender care of her, and her confidence in and affection for him is beautiful to behold. It suggests the constant care and providence of our Elder Brother, on whom we may rely absolutely, and in whose love we may rest.

A friend that sticketh closer than a brother. (Prov. 18: 24.)

Convict Ship "Success"

ONE of the oldest ships afloat is now in the Hudson River, off upper New York. It is the old British convict ship Success. She was built in Moulmein, Burma, 143 years ago, of teak wood throughout, the finest wood for making ships. She is 165 feet long and displaces 580 tons. She was at first a crack ship in the East India trade, and in 1806 she made her first voyage from Portsmouth to Australia with several hundred poor men and women who had been convicted of one crime or another and had been sentenced to banishment to the far-off South Pacific shores. It is said that fully one-third of the poor creatures died on the six months' voyage out, and many more perished from diseases contracted in the filthy cells where they were chained. Some years ago Captain D. H. Smith purchased the ship as an historical curiosity. With a small crew he worked her from Melbourne, his home, to England, where he exhibited her. A year ago he brought her across to Boston, and then to Providence, where she spent the winter, and now she is in port at New York, where she will be visited by many and where will be seen the tangible reminders of the crime, injustice, and cruelty of a hundred years ago. The Success marks the progress of the world in both justice and mercy since she began her deadly voyages. She has seen the slave-ships annihilated, the pirates driven from the face of the sea, the protection instead of oppression of the poor, and the care of a Christian age for the health, spirit, and morals of the prisoner rather than his torture. The convict ship, with its dark history, illustrates the fact that

The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. (Ps. 74: 20.)

THE FIGHT FOR INDIA'S CHILD WIVES

WE ALL know the lines of the "Barrack Room Ballad": "Somewhere east of Suez, where the best is like the worst and there ain't no ten commandments—" and that wonderful line, "The East is East and the West is West, and never the twain shall meet." These are but the words in which the genius Kipling sang in colloquial form the fundamental essential differences of principles—one might almost say eternal principles—that underlie the civilizations of the Orient and the Occident. Hence it is that a phrase that conveys little meaning to a Western ear may contain tragedy on a colossal scale for millions of Eastern hearts and lives. One such phrase is "child marriage," and another, related to it and of almost equally dire import, is "child widows."

There is no more encouraging evidence of the growing enlightenment of India than to find a great native organization fighting for reforms along these sociological lines. The Hindu Marriage Reform League is an outstanding example of such effort on the part of the educated Hindus. The league was founded by the late Rai Norendra Nath Sen Bahadur, who died July 1, 1911; and its present president is the Hon. Justice Sir Asutosh Mookerjee, Kt., Saraswati, C.S.I., M.A., D.L., D.Sc., F.R.A.S., etc., judge High Court and vice-chancellor Calcutta University.

The secretary and treasurer is Dr. Indu Madhav Mallick, B.L., M.A., M.D., professor of pathology, College of Physicians and Surgeons of Bengal.

The headquarters are at 70 Harrison Road, Calcutta, India.

The objects of the league are:

1. To raise the marriageable age of boys and girls to sixteen, and to spread education among girls on a wider scale than at present.

2. To educate public opinion on the question of marriage reform by means of lectures, books, pamphlets, tracts, leaflets, etc., and by such other means as may be found expedient.

3. To obtain a sufficient volume of Hindu public opinion which may have the effect of modifying the system of early marriage to an appreciable extent in the near future.

4. To minimize marriage expenses and dowries.

5. To take steps generally for the extension and promotion of the above-mentioned objects.

There are seventy-three branches of the league—forty-one for men and thirty-two for women—the presidents being, in every case, native gentlemen or ladies of exalted station in official, political, professional or social life.

More convincing than mere statistics are some photographs sent by Miss Carrie A. Tennant, the league's honorary traveling representative. One shows a child wife, eight years old, with two nine years of age. Their husbands are all over twenty-five. Another shows a girl of thirteen with her two-months-old baby in her arms, while another wife of ten stands beside her. A third is of a child of nine with her husband, aged thirty-four.

At a lecture delivered in Calcutta by Miss Tennant, she quoted Hon. Mohendra Lal Sircar, M.D., as saying that from medical observation extending over thirty years she could say that 25 per cent. of Hindu women died prematurely through early marriages, 25 per cent. more were invalided by the same cause, and the majority of the remainder suffered ill health from it. She said that in many parts of Southern India girls were married between the ages of six and ten. A special commissioner of the High Court in one of the cities there told her that he was one of the greatest sinners who would attend her meeting that evening, for in the preceding May he had given a daughter in marriage at the age of six; he joined the league, however, and promised to keep his other daughters single to a later age and educate them. In one city she visited a Hindu school of 500 boys, and when she asked all who were married to stand up, 200 responded, 98 of whom were fathers, and the first to stand up was a boy of nine. At the particular meeting at which this last statement was made (in Calcutta), the number of married girls between one year and fourteen was given as 8,487,430, and the number of child widows from one to fifteen to be 321,47(These figures were presumably for Bengal.

TWO HINDU CHILD-WIVES, THIRTEEN AND TEN YEARS OF AGE

Concerning child widows Miss Tennant reminde her hearers at Lucknow that 300,000 of their daugh ters below fifteen were doomed to lives of widow hood because of the terrible evil of early marriage and at Madras she spoke of statistics showing 700,00(child widows under five years old. These widow are, by custom, forbidden to marry again, and ar usually treated as slaves and drudges in the fami lies of their deceased husbands. The misery o their lot is simply beyond the conception of any on who has not personally seen the degradation, igno rance and servitude into which the so-called ethnic religions of Asia have trampled the women of the several races.

The league is a native organization throughout Miss Tennant's being the only foreign name on its list (except that of Mrs. C. P. Wallace, who recently left India after rendering much excellent service) as honorary traveling representative. It was founded by a native gentleman, and Miss Tennant quotes to her audiences the Shastras, Puranas and Vedas as well as the Sanhitas in support of the reforms she urges. Indeed, she maintains that "it is for the lack of the study of these sacred books that many social evils have crept into Hindu society."

At a meeting in Madras, the chairman, the Hon. Mr. Justice P. R. Sundara Aiyar, referred to the mischievous system, which is becoming more and more prominent, of receiving money from the parents of brides as consideration for allowing boys to marry them. It was considered so important that a word was coined—Varasulka (bride-price). This has become a great source of oppression on the part of those who had sons against those who had daughters. That morning he had received a letter from a gentleman subscribing to the league as a very poor father of a very poor girl, asking him to raise his voice against this system, which was ruining many a parent. Evils had really grown to that extent that there was nothing which more impoverished a father than having girls to marry. No longer was it the case that the property of the family came to the sons. The present condition of things was that all was exhausted before the daughters were married.

The league has a gigantic task before it. The Hindu population is something like 200,000,000, and when one begins even to think of the far-reaching effects of these evils, one is almost tempted to despair of accomplishing any perceptible results of real value. As for "eugenics," the question, "What chance has anybody to be 'well born' in such a community?" naturally arises. For the encouragement of India's well-wishers, however, it may be said that Miss Tennant's seventy-three league branches all occupy important strategic positions in the country and that the local heads are men and women whose official positions or personal attainments—or both—make the mere use of their names in itself a powerful force for good in the community.

"Satan's Throne," where the cruel test which meant either death or denial of their Lord was offered to so many Christians. Not far away are the ruins of the Temple of Julia, and, most massive of all, a magnificent piece of the acropolis wall, built of enormous stones, fully a hundred feet in height, and buttressing part of the hill itself, and extending some feet above it.

No description can give the reader an adequate account of these extensive ruins. They cover acres and acres and acres. To see them all one must walk for miles over rough and steep paths, often climbing over huge fragments of marble and masonry, mute relics of past glories.

The view from the summit is far more beautiful and scarcely less impressive than the ruins themselves. Fifteen miles away one catches a glimpse of the bright waters of the Ægean. In the nearer distance rise three great tumuli, some hundreds of feet in height, the graves of forgotten kings. Pausanias, writing nineteen hundred years ago, tells us that they are the tombs of Auge, the mother of Telephus, of Andromache and Pergamus.

Close to the base of the citadel lies the modern town, which we have already described, but it looks better from a distance, and its fifteen slender minarets relieve the city of the sordid appearance which it presents when one is in its crowded streets.

The most striking ruin within the confines of the modern town is a vast library of Roman times. This reminds us that our word parchment is derived from the name Pergamos or Pergamum, where sheepskins were first tanned for purposes of literary composition. In this library, it is said, were stored no less than 200,000 volumes or rolls of parchment, which Mark Antony gave to Cleopatra, in order that her great library at Alexandria might not be surpassed by the library of Pergamos.

Beyond the city stretches the wide and beautiful valley of the Caicus, charming as we saw it in the greenery and blossoms of early spring, and hemmed in on the further side by glorious mountains that stretch far up towards the clouds.

A little touch of homely modern life did our hearts good, as we stood upon the ancient citadel, for some young girls from the modern town had come up to the ruins with their baskets of provisions to enjoy a picnic amid the marble columns. Here they played "throw the handkerchief" and "puss, puss in the corner," and other games as familiar to the children of America as to the descendants of the ancient Pergamenians. From a spot of green sward below came the voices of many smaller children that sounded pleasantly as they mingled with the tinkle of the distant camel bells, the loading of the water buffaloes, and the occasional cry of the muezzin calling to prayer from the minaret.

There is no Protestant church, and perhaps no Protestant disciple in Pergamos, but the representatives of the Christians to whom the Revelator wrote belong to the Greek Orthodox faith.

As a last view from the citadel, it is pleasing to rest our eyes upon one section of the ancient library before alluded to, which has been made over into a Christian church, the Church of St. Antipas. It is an enormous circular church, forty-five feet in diameter and over seventy feet high, while the walls are seven feet thick, and there is an opening in the top, something like that in the Pantheon at Rome. Let us hope that in this Church of St. Antipas there may be many Orthodox Greek Christians, who, like Antipas of old, are Christ's faithful witnesses, who will receive at last the "hidden manna" and the "white stone" with the new name.

Questions and Answers

H. M. A., Hartford, Conn. The miracle of the feeding of the 5,000 took place near Bethsaida Julias, on the eastern border of Galilee, just beyond the territory of the tetrarch Philip. It lay on the eastern bank of the Jordan, at a point where that stream enters the lake. The fact that the Passover was at hand and that many were starting on the way to Jerusalem by the route around the lake and through Perea, would partly account for the presence of such numbers as are mentioned in the narratives of the evangelists. There was another town of the same name on the western bank of the lake, in Galilee (see John 12: 21).

C. W., Saginaw, Texas, writes: "I was just reading in your editorial page of 'The Leafless Bible,' and it reminded me of a piece one of my pastors gave me which pictures the Bible as being full of leaves and the leaves full of knowledge. It says: 'This book contains the mind of God, the state of man, the way of salvation, the doom of sinners and the happiness of believers. Its doctrines are holy, its precepts binding, its histories true, its decisions immutable. Read it to be wise, believe it to be safe, and practice it to be holy. It contains light to direct you, food to support you and comfort to cheer you. It is the traveler's map, the pilgrim's staff, the pilot's compass, the soldier's sword and the Christian's chart. Here paradise is restored, heaven opened and the gates of hell disclosed. Christ is its grand subject, our good its design, and the glory of God its end. It should fill the memory, rule the heart and guide the feet. Read it slowly, frequently, and prayerfully. It is a mine of wealth, a paradise of glory, and a river of pleasure. It is given you in life, will be opened at the judgment and remembered forever. It involves the highest responsibilities, will reward the greatest labors and will condemn all who trifle with its holy contents.'"

Mrs. J. L. P., Saratoga, Calif., writes: "We were pleased to see in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the picture illustrating the workings of the 'School Savings Banks.' Through the efforts of the National W. C. T. U. these banks are in operation in most of the large cities of our country. The bank in San Francisco, which is the depository for the School Savings Banks of that city, employs an automobile and two men during every hour of the school week going from school to school to get the deposits."

Mrs. H. F., Bellefontaine, Ohio. Please explain the expression "buried by baptism." Rom. 6: 4; Col. 2: 12.

These words are capable of both a literal and a spiritual interpretation. The theologians of the Baptist faith take them to indicate that immersion, in which the body is buried beneath the water, is the only legitimate form of baptism. They accept also the spiritual interpretation that this sign symbolizes and should be accompanied by a real death of the soul to sin and self-will and worldliness. Others hold that the latter meaning is the essential one and that the form or mode of physical baptism is not absolutely a matter of prime importance. However teachers may differ about the question of the form of baptism, there can be no difference about the spiritual force of these words. To the old life of self-will and self-confidence and self-assertiveness the Christian must die. See also Gal. 2: 20.

X. Y. Z. Please give me an opinion on this phase of domestic life. The father in the family when in good humor is kind enough, but has a disposition to force all in the family to submit without question to his will. Of course there are other members of the family who naturally partake of this same stubbornness, so obedience is not so prompt as it should be, and punishment falls on their heads with venom. Is it the duty of the wife to sit calmly by and see her own flesh and blood harshly and brutally treated without one word of pleading in their behalf, and must she be untrue to herself and to them by telling them that "all that father does is right"? It seems more than mother love can endure. And must she not do all she can to keep their love herself so as to keep them under the parental roof when they are a few years older?

Although this is truly a most trying situation there is little doubt that the Christian principle of love can solve it. The wife should begin by loving her husband still more tenderly, even though he is unreasonable. She must long to save his soul and to help him find deliverance from his ungovernable temper. Beginning with her own heart, she will also find much that she can do in the hearts of the children. There could, of course, be no excuse for her being untrue by telling them their father is in the right when she knows he is in the wrong. But she could urge them to love him; she must help them to conquer their own stubbornness; she must persuade them to obey quickly and cheerfully unless their father's demands are absolutely wrong. She is under no obligation, however, to keep silent when he is actually brutal in his punishment. The best modern ideas about punishment, both in school and home, are quite different from the earlier notions, which accepted severe and heavy punishment as a matter of course. Unjust and cruel punishment should not be tolerated, and, though it would be a most unfortunate necessity, the wife would be thoroughly justified in calling upon the aid of the law for the protection of her children. Before this is done, however, she should call in the pastor and perhaps one or two other friends of years and discretion. These extreme measures will, however, probably not be necessary. Prayer, love and faith have solved countless problems more difficult than this.

Reader, N. J. In Matt. 18: 15-17 our Lord was urging kindly forbearance one with another. One brother should not harbor a grudge against another, nor accuse him in presence of the unbelieving, but take him aside, speak to him kindly about his fault, and if he admits it and tries to make amends, then you have done him a real service and served the ends of justice as well. If this plan does not succeed, take other brethren as witnesses and deal with him in their presence in the same kindly and conciliatory spirit. Should even this fail, and if the matter be one of sufficient importance, invite him to join you in laying the whole subject before the congregation to which both belong and whom he cannot regard as other than fair-minded and impartial. If he reject all of these propositions for a peaceful adjustment of the trouble, he clearly puts himself beyond the pale of Christian effort and should be left alone.

M. A. J., Sandusky, N. Y. The passage in John 20: 17 has been much discussed: "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." (The interpretation to which you refer is a fanciful one, and has no basis in Scripture.) Mary, at the single word of recognition, would have thrown herself at Jesus' feet in homage and worship, not knowing the change which had taken place, from the natural body to the resurrection body, glorified, yet strangely like its predecessor. It is to be noted also that the disciples who had known him most intimately while he was with them failed to recognize him at first, but knew him quickly when he spoke to them.

F. L. H., Watsonville, Calif. Please explain Ezek. 18: 13, first half of verse. Do we do wrong to put money at interest in present times?

According to Hebrew law interest could be exacted from members of other races, but not from Hebrews themselves (see Deut. 23: 19, 20). By the earlier law (compare Lev. 19: 33, 34) it may have been regarded as wrong to demand interest even from outsiders. It was always forbidden to accept it from the poor. Christ refers to the taking of interest as an accepted principle of the commercial life of his day. (Matt. 25: 27; Luke 19: 23.) As to whether or not it is wrong at the present day must be determined by the individual conscience. As the commercial world is organized it is a necessary part of business, but it is quite clear that in an ideal state of society it would not be necessary. It must be remembered that the term "usury," as employed in the Bible, was equivalent to our word "interest." Usury now means excessive interest, which is forbidden legally, as well as by conscience.

B. D. R., South Gibson, Pa. 1. Gen. 2: 6 has been interpreted by some commentators as representing the condition of the earth in early antediluvian days, as rainless, the mist being caused probably by the gradual cooling of its surface. Such a condition, if general and prolonged, would obscure the heavens, and if any rainbow existed, it would be practically invisible. With the tremendous aqueous precipitation at the Flood, the advocates of this theory urge, there would be clearing atmosphere, and under such favoring conditions the whole heavenly phenomena would be clearly seen. These, of course, are merely conjectures. 2. All the facts we have concerning Noah's first sacrifice, on leaving the Ark, are stated in Gen. 8: 20. His altar was the first mentioned in the Bible, and upon it was laid the first burnt-offering.

Mrs. P. M., Three Forks, Mont. 1. If the old covenant is done away (Heb. 8: 13), why did Jesus say: "If ye will enter into life keep the commandments"? 2. What are we to conclude from such passages as Gal. 3: 13, I John 2: 3, 4, and Rev. 12: 17?

1. The people to whom Jesus spoke were living under the old dispensation. The great atonement for sin had not been made, and the only advice that could be given to seekers after holiness was to keep the law. It should be noted especially that the commandments Christ referred to here were the great commandments of the moral law, not the lesser requirements of the ceremonial law. Paul always insists that the Gospel does not do away with the claims of the moral law. (See Rom. 3: 31). The Gospel gives us power to keep the law. 2. Christ saves us from the penalty of the law, but after we have thus been pardoned and set at liberty, we are still under obligation to keep not only the moral law of the Old Testament, but the commandments of Jesus himself.

S. B., Sulphur, Okla. The passage in Matt. 27: 52, 53 relates all we know of the circumstance in question. These sleeping saints (see I Thess. 4: 14) were Old Testament believers, who, according to some commentators, were quickened into resurrection life and came forth at their Lord's resurrection. Others conclude that their graves were opened by the earthquake at the moment of Jesus' death, as though in preparation for their subsequent exit, when they rose with him in victory over death. They were thus made witnesses of and participants in the resurrection of Jesus, an incontrovertible testimony to the fact. One commentator adds: "There is no room to doubt that they went to glory with their Lord, as trophies of his victory over death."

BE RECONCILED TO THY BROTHER*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE love in the heart of Joseph which prompted him to forgive his brothers is the sublime theme of this lesson. When we say that Joseph had Christ-like love, we do not forget that Joseph lived at least seventeen hundred years before Jesus manifested his love for sinners by coming into this world to die for them. But the love of Jesus was in this world from the beginning. Jesus was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. (Rev. 13: 8.) So we may safely say that when men had love in their hearts, particularly love for the unlovely, it was Christlike love. Joseph loved his unlovely brothers. He loved them though they had sought to kill him. Joseph had learned by his tests that his brothers had come into a state of mind and heart where they could receive forgiveness. He was so impressed by this change that he ordered all of his courtiers and attendants to depart from his presence, leaving him alone with the pilgrims from Canaan. How dumbfounded and filled with fear they must have been when they found themselves alone with the ruler of Egypt, as they supposed, to hear their doom. How marvelous the opening of the floodgate of Joseph's tears as he wept so loud that "the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard." But they were glad tears to see his brothers so changed and to see alive his dearly loved brother Benjamin. But the brothers were filled with fear rather than rejoicing to discover that the brother whom they supposed to be dead was really the ruler of Egypt. Their consciences pricked them harder than ever before. Their fears, however, were assuaged by the tender words and embraces of Joseph, who, when he was at the point of declaring his forgiveness, tried to shield them from self-recrimination by saying: "Be not grieved nor angry with yourselves that ye sold me hither, for God did send me before you to preserve life." (Gen. 45: 5.) "And he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them." That was the Oriental way. And then the forgiven brothers gained courage to talk with the great lord of Egypt! It was sweet to be forgiven, but it was sweeter far to forgive.

Jesus loved Peter despite his fickleness and cowardice and denials. He loved Thomas in spite of his stubborn doubts, and John notwithstanding the quick temper with which he called for fire from heaven upon the city which refused provisions for his Master. Jesus loved the three apostles, Peter, James and John, even when they fell asleep amid the agony which drew the bloody sweat from him. Jesus loved not only his disciples, but the vicious classes of his day, though their vices were unspeakably loathsome to one of his pure nature. He did what has always been found so difficult—hated the sin, and yet loved the sinner.

Joseph had the Christlike spirit, for his thoughts went immediately out to his brothers, as to how he could relieve them from want and famine, and establish them in peace and plenty. But we have not yet touched the tenderest spot in the heart of Joseph; it was the love he felt for his father Jacob. He had learned from his brothers that he was still alive, and so he said to them: "Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say to him: Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt: come down unto me, tarry not; . . . and thou shalt be near unto me, . . . and there will I nourish thee."

Dr. Joseph Parker says of this: "A day of reconciliation! A family made one. Brethren coming together after a long separation. It is a beautiful picture. Why should it not be completed, where it needs completion, in our own day amongst ourselves? . . . Families and households often get awry. The younger brother differs with his elder brother—sisters fall out. One wants more than belongs to him; another is knocked to the wall because he is weak; and there come into the heart bitterness and alienation, and often brothers and sisters have scarce a kind word to say of one another. Is it always to be so? Do not merely make it up, do not patch it up, do not cover it up; go right down to the base. You will never be made one until you meet at the cross and hear Christ say, 'Whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother.'"

But who is to begin? That is the wonderful question that is often asked us. Who is to begin? One would imagine that there were some very nice people about who only wanted somebody to tell them who was to begin. They want to be reconciled, only they don't know who is to begin. I can tell you. You are! "But I am the eldest,"—yes, and therefore ought to begin. "But I am the youngest." Then why should the youngest be obstinate? Who are you that you should not go and throw yourself down at your brother's feet, and say, "I have done you wrong; pardon me!" Who is to begin? You! Which? Both! When? Now!

Joseph and his brothers were reconciled, because the one who had been harmed was willing to forgive the past and fill the future with kindness. Such a spirit on his part quickly closed the hearts of his brothers as one may put a drop of a certain kind of chemical into water black as ink, and it will immediately become clear and colorless. A more wonderful alchemy is that by which the grace of God enters an angry, revengeful spirit and changes it into the purity of lovingkindness and forgiveness.

The "good news" about Joseph and his brothers was soon passed along until it reached the ears of Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, "and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants." And Pharaoh said to Joseph—only he did not call him by that name, but "Zaphnath-paaneah," which meant "bread of life," a name Pharaoh had given to Joseph because he had laid up food for the people during the seven years of famine—Pharaoh said to him, "Tell your brothers to go back to their home land, and get their father, and their families, and come to me, and I will give the best of the land for them to live in, and they shall have plenty to eat. Give them wagons of food to carry back, and food to eat along the way." What a noble king was that! So Joseph loaded his brothers with presents for his father, and presents of clothing and other things as well, but he gave more to Benjamin than to any of the others, because he loved him best of all, as he was the youngest, the "kid brother." What a happy going home that was! And what a happy coming home it was when they told their father that Joseph was still alive, and that they had seen him; that he was the ruler of Egypt, and had sent them to bring him to Egypt. It seemed to Father Jacob "too good to be true," but when his sons showed him the presents they had brought, he said: "It must be true, and I will go and see my son Joseph before I die." And preparations for the journey began to be made.

"Burying the hatchet" is the phrase that is sometimes used when persons who have been at odds decide to give up their differences and become friends. In the case of Joseph and his brothers, the hatchet seemed to belong only to the brothers, but Joseph helped them to bury it. Under the wagon loads of food which Joseph gave to his starving brothers it disappeared, never to be brought to light again. It was buried even deeper when the good land of Goshen was given them to dwell in. We seem now to hear a sweet chime of bells, which ring out in glad harmony, "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." These are the words of our Golden Text, to be stored in our memories to guard us against cherishing any unkind feelings. It will help us to keep in mind how nobly Joseph treated his brothers.

A savage chief when he was being baptized held up his right arm out of the water, and afterward explained that he was reserving that right hand to take vengeance on his enemies. That seems horrible, but it is no worse than to keep a grudge or the intention of revenge in one's heart.

But in contrast with this is the action of some slaves in Jamaica who were freed by Great Britain at midnight on July 1, 1838. They prepared a mahogany coffin and placed in it whips, torturing irons, branding irons, handcuffs, etc., etc., and screwed down the lid. And as the bell began to toll for midnight, a voice was heard to cry out: "The monster is dying! Is dying! Is dying," and as the last stroke sounded: "The monster is dead. Let us bury him out of sight forever." Then the coffin was lowered into its grave, and a throng of fourteen thousand adults and five thousand children joined in singing the doxology. Dr. Arthur T. Pierson in recounting this incident says: "This is the way in which those black slaves took vengeance on their former masters—not by deeds of violence and murder, but by burying the remnants of their long bondage, seventy-eight years—in the grave of oblivion. Where did they learn such magnanimous love, excepting of Him whose greatest miracle was his dying prayer, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.'"

* THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for June 8, 1913. Joseph Forgives His Brethren. Gen. 45: 1 to 46: 7. GOLDEN TEXT: "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!" Ps. 133. 1

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

HOW CAN WE get scholars to be present at the opening of the Sunday school? This question has come to us not from one superintendent but from many. Tardiness seems to be a general fault. We will tell how it is being corrected in a Washington Sunday school. The hour of opening is half past nine. Matters had grown so bad that on the average only fifty persons were present at that time, hardly one-tenth of the number enrolled as members of the school. The pastor and the superintendent agreed upon "a surprise plan," and it was announced, "There will be a great surprise, something very interesting to see and hear, next Sunday morning for those who are present at half-past nine." It was a Christian Indian, who read the Scriptures and sang a hymn. Another Sunday it was Sophie the scrub-woman evangelist of New York, who made a remarkable address on evangelistic and missionary work, telling how she had been impelled to give to China a hundred dollars of hard-earned money which she had laid by because she had heard God's voice over and over again saying: "God wants you to send that money to China, that hundred dollars that you have." Afterwards she regularly scrubbed one day a week for either China, or Africa, or India. Keeping that up year after year, she had been able to help a great deal in many lands. Another Sunday a small boy whistled several beautiful hymns with a piano accompaniment. It is proposed to have a ram's horn obtained in Jerusalem blown by an expert on some Sunday near at hand, when many interesting things mentioned in the Bible about the blowing of trumpets will be recounted. As a result of the "surprise plan" the number of those present at the opening has risen to two hundred and fifty, and the number is still rising.

Late Sunday breakfasts and mid-day dinners are responsible for much of the tardiness in the Sunday school whether it be held in the morning or afternoon. Let this defect be met by turning over a new leaf, and having the breakfast at an hour which will give ample time to the children or where it is necessary have the Sunday mid-day meal well over before the appointed hour of Sunday school.

ALL SUPERINTENDENTS AND TEACHERS are invited to send communications to W. F. Crafts, 206 Pennsylvania Avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

aboled ahead with his booty, its k strings streaming, casting a kward look of invitation for them follow. Down the hill, through a in the Fennel fence, into a new wed field they raced, dog, man and . Kinnie—she had on boy's shoes ank in the soft soil and pitched ford, across David's arm, as he ght her.

Now David as a child had experied no temptation to "play with the nels," his mother's adjurations ing formed in him a mental habit shunning the brood under the hill. t Kinnie had ceased to be a Fennel! was the Girl. She was the Happess of Childhood returned. She s Romance, Adventure, Surprise. e impossible had come to pass. The known had become sociable and approachable. There were, suddenly, no nnies in heaven that David did not mpse. Kinnie was not a Fennel! e was a guide back to happiness, a nbol of wider futures.

"You must never feel ashamed or aid with me. Won't you promise that, Kinnie?"

She glanced sideways through heavy hes and answered:

"Yes, Mr. David."

"I want you to call me David," he ged.

Across the pulsating idyl of the mont a voice broke sharply.

"Kin-nie!" called Mrs. Fennel.

With the voice came realization to vid. His mother's commands rerned overwhelmingly. Shamefaced, turned away.

"I must be crazy, plumb out of my ad," he muttered, and flung his engies into the ever-waiting farm rk. As he went in to supper he Mrs. Fennel emerging from the ck door.

"She's been over to tell me she saw u talking to Kinnie," his mother exained. She was standing by the ve, dishing up supper, and seemed rfectly unconcerned.

"Why—oh—did she? That's all ht," he mumbled, dashing cold wa on his face at the kitchen sink.

Mrs. Burke laughed. "I sometimes ink Amelia Fennel is out of her ad," she commented, and made no rther allusion to their neighbor's sit save to mutter, once or twice, nder her breath.

"Thinks she's going to have a ano, and my son—my son!—paying tention to her daughter! Yes, melia Fennel is out of her head."

Her evident confidence in him made avid uncomfortable. "But I'll cut t all that sort of foolishness after is," he resolved.

After supper he sat down to his sk in the sitting-room and gave his ind to the daily accounts. Mrs. urke "cleared up the table" and rought out her sewing. The gaudy ag rugs, the two lighted lamps and e very stiff, very white lace curtains nparted cheerfulness to the domestic cene. Presently the wind came up in hard blow, shutters banged and dry wigs snapped against the pane.

At seven o'clock the mistress of the ouse folded her work and rose.

"Did you find the heifer, son?" she ethought to inquire.

He started guiltily. He had forotten the heifer.

"No," he confessed, frowning over he papers.

Her lips parted in an indulgent mile. "She'll come up of herself," he prophesied. "I always say, 'Give our animals salt and your menfolks ictuals and confidence and they'll all ome home at night.'"

His eyes followed her as she went pstairs, carrying the lighted lamp. He felt strangely young, elate. Why, e was so happy that it was no hardhip at all to promise himself that his uture care should be all for his nother, and no girl, unloved by her, should ever occupy his thoughts.

The storm increased and he stepped outside to take a last look at things before closing the house. It was a lowering night, a gray, swirling, noisy night. The puppy frisked at his feet and he saw that it was still worrying the pink sunbonnet. He attempted a rescue and the dog, alert for another frolic, bounded off with its plaything. Hatless and coatless, the wind sweet in his nostrils, David pursued, around the house, through the gate, up the hill.

There was a blur of stiff darkness on the white road. A flash of lightning showed him that it was a young girl holding back her blowing hair with both hands. Before he could retreat there came a second keen flash of white fire, the branch of an old oak not ten feet distant fell across the roadway, and a clap of thunder crashed over their heads. Kinnie screamed and ran towards him. She clung to him, trembling in the familiar scene as it turned inimical and menacing.

The man had a feeling of unreality. A moment—a second—since, he was watching his mother, devotion and loyalty for her in every heart beat. How had this happened to him? How was it that this wild joy was pulsating through him?

The wind flung the trapped children against each other as it bent the trees to earth and sent the shingles scuttling from the Fennel roof. David, holding the quick-breathing child-woman in his arms, did not at first realize that the stars were shining again, the pale moon creeping back between black shades.

Kinnie lifted her face, white and deep-eyed, from his shoulder.

"I thought it was going to rain," she half whispered, "and I came out to find my bonnet."

"Why, I just saw Rover with it." He tried to speak lightly as he released her. "Where is that puppy? That lightning must have struck somewhere near here," he went on more naturally.

Looking down she tumbled out the fact that was more ominous to her. "David, ma went to your house today. She was awful mad because you —I—"

He nodded. "I know. Forgive me. I—Kinnie, what came over us? Why, we've known each other always."

"I reckon it was something we hadn't known always," she argued sagely.

What a night it was! The winds, roaring across the dusky fields, carried the black clouds with them. The moon shot forth a cloud of golden arrows. David saw the girl in the golden mist, her lips trembling, tears gathering slowly on her dark lashes.

"I wish—your mother—liked me," murmured the musical voice.

"Maybe she will some day," he promised vaguely.

Her eyes grew starry. Her smile, timid, quivering, innocent yet eloquent, was his undoing. He caught her in his arms and covered the soft, silken hair with caresses, saying over and over, "Kinnie, Kinnie."

"You mustn't—yet," she entreated, pushing him from her. "Oh, listen to me, David. There's a chance that I may be made teacher in the county school. Miss Merton is going to be married. Maybe—your mother—might —like me better if she knew that."

He caught at the hope.

"How soon?" he asked, pressing her hands hard against his beating heart.

"It won't be till next term. Sister Kate can get me a good position where she is. I wanted to go—" Blushing she completed the sentence, "this morning."

"I'm sure mother will like your being a teacher," he said confidently. It seemed to change matters entirely and give a hope for happiness. Before they parted they resolved not to confide in his mother until Kinnie became one of the school force and so entitled to respect. Two months later David said to his mother, "Kinnie Fennel has been made a teacher in the county school."

Mrs. Burke, her mouth full of pins, was kneeling on the floor, stretching curtains.

"That so?" she articulated with difficulty. "Gimme another chair, David, to put this stuff on."

David stood still, his hands in his pockets.

"Mother," he blurted out, "I want to marry Kinnie."

The old woman got up stiffly, groaning a little involuntarily as her knees straightened. Her hands shook.

"Have I brought you up for this?" she cried, her eyes fierce under their gray, bristling brows. "I watched over your cradle, gave up everything for you, and now—in my old age—you, my only child, want to bring this disgrace on me!" She started towards him as she had been wont when he was a disobedient small boy. "David, if you marry a Fennel I will never forgive you—never—as long as the hill stands!"

He was frightened by her face, its grayish pallor, the horror and despair of the expression. But the only thing that seemed possible to him at the moment was to leave her alone with the blow he had dealt.

In the morning, for the first time in her son's memory, his mother's capable hands were helpless, her strong, kind face piteous and blank. The very curtains, drying unstretched, accused him who had struck down the mistress of the house.

He carried up her breakfast, neatly arranged on a tray.

"I can't eat, my boy," she refused in a voice that brought him kneeling by her bedside.

"It shall be as you say, mother," he promised in a low, unsteady voice. "I will not marry without your consent."

She put a tremulous hand on his shoulder and the slow, pathetic tears of age stole down her cheeks.

In a few days she was up and about again. At first his relief in her recovery seemed to compensate for the sacrifice of anticipated happiness. His young shoulders bowed, furrows creased his face. But he saw to it that his mother had "help" in the kitchen. He bought a carriage and they drove townward together, she in a new black silk and purple bonnet. As they passed the gray, sagging roof of the Fennels, he turned aside his head. When a bird sang he started painfully lest it prove to be a girl trilling.

He lacked courage to go and talk frankly with Kinnie.

"Mother will not consent," he scribbled on a vagrant sheet of paper which he sent by her brother. "We must not see each other. It only makes it harder. I wish now that you had gone to your sister Kate's. Mother vows we can never marry as long as the hill stands.—David."

Later he learned that she had given up her position and gone to Kate Fennel, in another State. He heard the news with a sensation of sorrowful relief.

In the fall his mother died peacefully and happily, her eyes fixed with love on her boy to the last.

One evening he drove slowly homeward over the snow-shrouded hill. He walked to and fro on the long front porch—to and fro in the Sunday-like hush and leisure. He could not bear the silence within. At last he walked toward the hill, aimlessly seeking refuge from the loneliness of the deserted house.

The stillness of the late afternoon was broken by a girl singing, as she ascended the hill from the other side:

Daisies and buttercups bring I to you,
Daisies and buttercups sparkling in dew.

"Kinnie," he called, as she saw and half turned away. "Wait; I must see you." He rushed up the incline, head down, breathing heavily. "I'm glad you're here," he greeted her abruptly, stopping at a discreet distance, not offering to shake hands. "I wanted to see you."

"It is my vacation," she explained confusedly. "Sister Kate came with me. We'll be here until after Christmas. Ma wrote me—about your mother. I'm sorry—"

His emotions were too primal, too intense to let him listen to condolences. There was tragic, brutal directness in the way he interrupted. "When my mother was dying," he said, looking across the fields away from her, "she asked me to make a promise. I said the words after her, 'As long as the hill stands I will not marry Kinnie Fennel.'"

The wood smoke from the chimneys on either side took on a wan, wintry dryness that was spectral. The man and girl, though for a long time neither spoke, felt themselves to be saying a great deal of farewell, of surrender, to each other. It was Kinnie, the tears sparkling on her cheeks, who broke the pregnant silence.

"It can't ever be any different now." Her eyes wandered towards the distant cemetery. "Even if she—were sorry—if she changed—she couldn't tell us—now."

"No," David acknowledged huskily. "She couldn't know how hard she was making life for me. I believe if she saw me, alone—like this—" He clenched and unclenched his hands, which hung at his side. "She used to come to my bed at night when I was a little chap and wipe away my tears, and say, 'If I'd known you cared so much, David, I wouldn't have done it.'"

"If you had only—if she had only understood," sighed Kinnie.

They talked on fragmentarily for a little while, speaking of the precious moments that they had spent together in the past; of her recent experiences in the city; of her plans for the future. She and her sister would return soon to their new home; she and David would meet no more. They were both resolved on that point.

Jimmy Fennel came driving the milk wagon up the hill, passed them and rumbled and clattered downwards to the Burke farm.

"He'll tell ma," said Kinnie. "She thinks we ought not to even speak to each other, David."

"And that's true enough," he agreed. "This must be the last time, Kinnie." He kissed her once tenderly, in renunciation, on the forehead, and they parted.

She watched through tears until he reached and entered the desolate house, her hands against her soft, warm cheeks. Ah, what love and sweetness, what companionship and laughter she held ready to carry down the hill and into that lonely heart.

"But the end has come," she taught herself with courage inherited from her mother. "I must make a new life for the future. I must. I shall."

David, lest temptation overcome him, determined to leave his place in charge of tenants and travel. Surely the world was large enough to absorb one heartache. He forgot that it has many millions thrown on its mercy. But the trip, his first departure from familiar environments, at least distracted his mind for the time. He returned strengthened in many ways. Home looked good to the wanderer and neglected work called like the voices of friends. He was beginning to realize that responsibility is something, that no life that is busy is unendurable. Then Mrs. Fennel became ill and Kinnie was called back. The realization that she was near started into renewed activity a thousand restless longings and regrets.

"How is your mother?" he continually questioned Jimmy, hoping, though fearing, to hear Kinnie's name coupled in the answer.

"She's up," Jimmie answered at the end of the week. "Kinnie's goin' tonight. The school teacher promised to call by and take her to town in his new buggy," he added proudly.

In the late afternoon David permitted himself to seek a location from which it was possible to catch a glimpse of the Fennel house. It was a clear, beautiful day; the snow was quite pink with twilight. The Fennel chimneys spouted unusually. There was a fire in the parlor. His heart contracted instinctively. He clenched his hands when a horse and buggy, driven by the young teacher, drew up at Kinnie's gate. It seemed to him a deadly insult, very personal, that this careless youth should alight just here and go up the broken bits of board that served the Fennels for a walk.

The door opened. Kinnie came out, cheeks glowing, laughing as the young man said something to her, bending his head close. He lifted her into the buggy and sprang gaily in after her. They drove away, their voices floating back to the miserable man on the hillside.

David was up betimes in the morning to turn the blade in the wound by discussing it with Jimmy.

"Did—did Kinnie go last night?" he asked.

Jimmy nodded cheerfully. "I reckon that thar red cow's comin' through all right," he changed the subject to matters of more importance.

David was retreating in disgust when a stranger appeared and asked Jimmy for a drink of water. He then perceived that there was a group of men gathered on the hillside. He listened idly to Fennel's questioning of the stranger.

"What you all think you're doing up thar?" Jimmy asked politely.

"Surveying for the Good Roads Committee," the man replied good-naturedly as he drank at the pump. "They're aiming to make a level stretch from town to the Ridge. Reckon they'll tunnel this hill."

"Why don't you all go round?" suggested Fennel, son of an easy-direction-seeking father. "Don't tunneling cost a heap?"

"Money ain't no object to them men," said the stranger, blowing a great breath of satisfaction as he gave Jimmy the dipper.

All through the spring and summer David watched the men dig the tunnel. In the fall his haggard eyes questioned the hill as though it were a clay sphinx, the keeper of mighty secrets, an earth-god that might show mercy to the human clod who tilled it.

Great windlasses and excavators had gullied its heart. Black and uncanny yawned the great hole they had made.

"But the hill stands," said David to himself. "It is murdered; its heart is being cut out—but the hill stands as a man's promise must."

It was the harder for him because he knew that Kinnie was again with her mother and he felt that she might have shared his secret hope, might have remembered the qualifying clause of the promise exacted from him. But he did not see her.

As the harvest moon waned and the days lengthened came the rains, swiftly, resonantly, incessantly, beating upon the green hill. The windows became so many walls of mist and gloom; the roads a wash of muddy streams. Jimmy could not deliver the milk; the fields could not be worked, and enforced idleness was added to the general desolation.

One night, after it had rained for days upon days, David sank into a deep dream of falling mountains in which the crest of the hill was laid low and he and Kinnie passed over it, hand in hand, like children, into a new country. He was awakened by a strange, ominous, rumbling sound. Men and women, all the people within earshot, rushed out of doors. Shrouded in raincoats, shawls, anything for protection, carrying lanterns, they gathered in the road, shouting above the storm, one to another, in awed voices:

"What's happened?"

The answer cut sharply through the thunder of heavy waters: "The hill has caved in!"

The rain beat, white-winged, on the changed earth. The trees rocked, strange silhouettes against the far, faint, scared dawn. A vast, brownish, shapeless mass where the hill had risen yesterday, was settling slowly into new relationship with air and light.

David, moving with difficulty, for the scattered dirt and rock erected new barriers, made his way forward. The phenomena, the excitement of his companions, faded into a blurred background; one clear issue, and one only, obsessed him, lighted up his mind like a flash from heaven. He must find Kinnie and claim her. The hill had fallen. He must cross the bridge of freedom, the road of air that had been but yesternight a solid barrier of rock and soil standing for centuries.

Kinnie, her cold little hands dripping, the rain thick on her sweet, pale face, came through the dawn to meet him. Reaching out his hands to her, he cried with strangely vibrant voice:

"The hill stands no longer, Kinnie."

AMONG THE WORKERS

—Miss Sarah Wirt Peoples, missionary to the Laos in Siam, writes that the "Laos Mission needs eight ordained men, three physicians and five women teachers. Dr. and Mrs. Peoples are hoping to go back to the field at Nan, Laos, on September 1, with health nearly restored."

—Rev. M. N. Popoff sends the following interesting communication from Samakov, Bulgaria: "Some time ago I received $7, contributed by readers of The Christian Herald for purchasing New Testaments and Bibles for soldiers. I now wish to report what has been done with the $7. I immediately sent the amount to Rev. A. Georgieff in Yambol, who ever since the opening of the war is as a volunteer serving in the military hospital of that city, being put in charge of the supplies for the hospital. He writes that with the $7 he purchased and distributed to the wounded soldiers 170 New Testaments and four Bibles. I can assure the donors that they have made a good investment. All Bulgarian soldiers can read, and they have been very grateful for tracts and New Testaments given them. Many soldiers went to the battlefield with their Testaments, and have read them over and over."

—The Mothers' League of Public School No. 25, of Brooklyn, of which Mrs. F. F. Purdy is president and Mrs. A. F. Zahn secretary, is promoting a movement for a curfew law in that district. The organization is hoping to bring about the enactment of a law requiring all children under fifteen years of age unaccompanied by adults to be off the street after ten o'clock at night. The board of managers of the Sunday School Union of Brooklyn, of which Mr. Edward R. Carhart is president, has issued a stirring circular letter, urging the parents of the city to arouse themselves to the importance of keeping in close touch with their children, exercising a careful control over them and doing all they can to counteract and remove the many evil influences to which they are subjected.

—Mr. Isaac N. Snyder, Sr., A.M., has written an interesting and attractive book entitled Looking Skyward and the Earth. The book is recommended by scholars and pastors. It is written in popular language and is reverent as well as scholarly. It would indeed be a fortunate thing if people generally were more interested in the stars, and more familiar with them. The whole outlook of life is broadened when one's mind is drawn out to consider the wide spaces of the universe and understand its marvels. Particularly when this study is combined with a devout spirit are the results gratifying and valuable. The book contains seventeen chapters and twenty-five illustrations. It is published by Mr. Snyder at Liberty, Ind., and may be ordered from him by mail. Its price is $1.30.

MRS. J. G., of Syracuse, N. Y., writes: "I would like to add my testimony to the hundreds of others that God ars and answers prayer. For the st three years I have been suffering om a nervous breakdown. It is only e last few months that I can say I n really well. Before a complete re- very was possible, I had to undergo operation. W., Jr., of Middle- ury, Va., writes: "I wish to acknowl- dge through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD hat when my father was ill recently asked the Lord to restore him to ealth and he did so." Mrs. L. J. E., f Calera, Ala., writes: "I want to ac- nowledge God's goodness in answering my prayers in behalf of my little one and in giving me back my own health. My little girl was critically ill and I know God restored her to health in answer to special prayer." Another mother, Mrs J. E. W., writes from Tunnelton, Pa.: "I want to acknowledge through the columns of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD our thanks to God for sparing the life of our little girl, who was very sick. We feel that God has been wonderfully kind to us." Here is another little Pennsylvania girl who was healed in answer to prayer. C. S. M., of Philadelphia, writes: "We desire to acknowledge publicly an answered prayer for the restoration to health of our little girl who was dangerously ill with diphtheria."

Miss L. D., of New York, writes: "Through prayer a burden of financial embarrassment has been lifted. Also through prayer a loved one who was away from home and in great danger has returned in safety, for which I wish to praise our kind heavenly Father, who does answer our earnest prayers."

Mrs. M. E. T., an aged saint of Norwood Park, Chicago, is too infirm to write, but sends, by the pen of a friend, this message to CHRISTIAN HERALD readers: "Our dear heavenly Father has answered my prayers in his wise, kind way since my childhood days. And as the years roll by and I go down the sunset of life, I can truly say: 'Thy will, not mine, be done.'"

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

WONDERFUL SUNDAY SCHOOL RECORDS

I HAVE been a subscriber and close reader of your valuable paper for thirty years, and have read from time to time of Sunday school record attendance. For the past forty-four years I have averaged a little more than once each Sunday. Part of the time I have attended two schools, one in the morning and one in the afternoon. For the past twenty years I have attended but once on Sunday, and have missed but one session—on account of severe sickness. I take great delight in Sunday school work. During all those years I have filled the offices of superintendent, assistant superintendent, teacher and scholar. I do not wish to boast of my record in Sunday school attendance, but trust it may induce others to attend all the time. ALLEN CHURCH.

Thirty-Seven Years Without Missing

A MEMBER of my class of ladies in St. Paul's Reformed Sunday school, Reading, Pa., Miss Mary A. Simon, has not missed a single session of the school during thirty-seven years until a year ago, when she was detained at home by the death of a sister. And she has not missed a Sunday since. If there is a longer record of regular Sunday school attendance anywhere it would be interesting to know of it.

May I, in this connection, correct a popular error which prevails in reference to the founding of the first Sunday school of the world? It is generally stated that Robert Raikes was the founder of the first Sunday school at Gloucester, England, in 1780. The fact is that the first Sunday school was established by Ludwig Hoecker in 1740 at Ephrata, Lancaster County, Pa. This was forty years before the work of Mr. Raikes. Mr. Hoecker's school was for the religious instruction of the children of the neighborhood. Among other methods employed he wrote Bible verses upon cards which the children committed to memory. Later he had the cards printed. Mr. Hoecker died in 1792, after a long and useful career.

Thirty-One Years' Consecutive Attendance

UNDER date of April 23, 1913, page 405, you have an article bearing upon the case of Miss Susan Steed, Middletown, Conn., who has the very creditable record of having attended Sunday school every Sunday in the year for twenty-five consecutive years. This is indeed very good. We beg, however, to state that Miss Jane Long, Harrisburg, Pa., has attended the Fourth Street Church of God Sunday school every Sunday for thirty-one consecutive years, which exceeds the record of Miss Steed to the extent of six years. Never Missed in Thirty Years

THE secretary, Mr. Albert W. Bisbing, of class 64, Fifth Baptist Church Bible school, has not missed a session for over thirty years. He came into the class April 22, 1883, and has never missed a session since, part of the time coming a distance of eight miles. We just passed our fortieth anniversary last month, of which we enclose a souvenir.

RURAL CHURCH AND COUNTRY LIFE

forces of the rural community revolve around the country church. Are we not again asking too much of the church and its ministers? If this program could be carried out, would it not work harm to the church, just as it did in the fifth century, when the legislation of the Roman emperors placed the administration of all municipal affairs, taxation, education, public works and defense into the hands of the clergy and bishops?

Whatever has been accomplished in our day for the betterment of economic and social conditions, for the knitting together of the various forces of society and the social uplift of the community, has been accomplished through the state rather than through the church.

Did the church have no part in these things? Most assuredly: She not only took the first steps towards organizing these various co-operative social activities, establishing schools, hospitals, charities and benevolences, afterwards taken over by the state; but by her insistence upon those great foundation truths which underlie all social organization—that all men are brethren; that each is his brother's keeper; that despite outward differences of birth or fortune all men are equal before God and therefore entitled to equal justice, equal economic opportunities and equal social advantages in their mutual relations with each other—she acted as the salt of the earth, the great preservative of society.

Thus her teaching is at the bottom of our anti-trust legislation, the control of public service corporations, the physical valuation of railroads, not to speak of old age pensions, workingmen's compensation acts, public playgrounds and the care for the public health. It is at the bottom of this agitation for the co-operative organization of agricultural business. But this does not mean that the church is called to do the organizing any more than she is called to conduct a railroad-rate investigation. It is for her to fearlessly proclaim the truth, leaving it to her members as citizens to translate that truth into civic action.

I can conceive of circumstances under which it may be advisable and necessary for the church, with benefit to society, to adopt such an ambitious program as that described above. When the monastic orders of the ancient church, which were originally associations of laymen, began their missionary labors among the barbarians by establishing conventual communities in the unbroken forests of northern Europe, around which all social activities revolved, they proceeded "to knit together the economic, intellectual, social and moral forces of the community until country life had been completely transformed." The church thus conferred an immense material benefit upon the social order. Whatever men, during the dark ages, knew of agricultural science had been taught them by the monasteries under whose direction and upon whose lands they learned co-operative effort.

But this by no means proves that the church of to-day ought to adopt a similar program, unless it be admitted that rural society is in a state similar to that which confronted the missionaries who in the eighth century followed St. Boniface to the oak forests of central Europe. The American farmer will hardly thank the church for making such an admission, even by implication.

Every social question is in its last analysis a moral question. It is therefore to be assumed that the moral and social sense of the church will be in advance of that represented by the legislation of the State. It may thus fall to her lot to undertake certain social activities in advance of the state. But this does not mean that organizing corn clubs and rural credit associations is her proper function. If she through her members who are also citizens does these things, she does them, not as a church, but as a voluntary association of interested individuals who by personal effort are doing something for the state which the state is not yet ready to do for itself.

As I read my Bible, the church is commanded to do but one thing: Bring men into the obedience of faith by the preaching of the Gospel. Since preaching must be followed by practice, hearing by doing, and faith by life, it is plain that the church through her teaching must suggest and inspire ever new phases of economic and social effort. An attempt to organize and direct these various activities means that she will cumber herself with much serving instead of busying herself with the hearing of the Master's Word. Yet this is urged upon her by the well-meaning people who insist that she grasp as a supreme opportunity this present agitation for the co-operative organization of agricultural community interests. They forget that it was not Martha but Mary who had chosen the better part, for the much serving of the one sister seems so to impress most people that they utterly refuse to see any good whatsoever in the quiet devotion of the other. Let the church take heed lest it neglect the Word to cumber itself with much serving.

I am quite aware that the Lord of the church not only preached the Word but also fed the multitudes who waited on his ministry. He cared for their bodies even as he cared for their souls. But the feeding of the multitude was not his ordinary occupation. Nor should the transformation of country life through increased crop production and the providing of opportunities for intellectual advancement and social recreation be the ordinary occupation of his ministers.

Does this mean that the country church and its ministers are to take no part or interest in this present country life movement? Not at all. It simply means that they dare not, as they would be faithful, neglect spiritual teaching to promote scientific agriculture. They dare not center their attention upon temporal rather than eternal things. They dare not concern themselves with economic, intellectual, social and moral forces and activities rather than Christian missions, Christian education and Christian benevolence. To do this would mean to forget that their Lord said: "My kingdom is not of this world."

But they are in the world. While they may not organize and direct all secular occupations and activities, they may, ay, they must, by influence and example lift them up to a higher plane of increased usefulness and nobler service.

It was for this reason that men of old endowed each country parish with a parish glebe or farm. It was never their intention that the country minister should be a farmer rather than a pastor. Nor did they desire that he should spend his time in agricultural experimentation and demonstration. Neither did they care to have him discuss, except to illustrate spiritual truths, the difference between good seed and bad seed. But they did want him to be close to the soil, for that brought him closer to them. They therefore arranged for his support, not on the basis of money payment, but rather by the attaching of fertile fields to his benefice. They knew that the possession of land means a degree of independence which cannot be secured in any other way. Besides, it is the most certain of all means to secure the permanence of any institution. While no farmer likes his minister to pose as an agricultural expert, he does like him to have some knowledge of the care, toil and labor which fill his life. The farmer more than any other man feels his dependence upon the

THE FRIENDLINESS OF DEFEAT

ONE of the major paradoxes of life is that defeat leads to triumph! Commonly we are of the opinion that triumph lies in the garnished path of successive victories, that such course leads to one's ultimate end and brings the individual face to face with his cherished ideals; yet the fact remains that defeat is a better friend than we know.

It was not by means of successive victories that the great world characters and world leaders were made, and by which they left the impress of their personalities upon the mind of the world; but they developed in character, grew in power, and flourished in influence simply because they recognized the value of defeat, and used it as the most potent factor in the accomplishment of their ends in life.

True manhood, noble character and sublime achievement are the direct products of defeat. No worthy life has ever yet been produced by means of continued and unhindered success. The way of ease is the way to disease —physical, mental and moral. It is the life that faces difficult undertakings, that wrestles with the most stupendous tasks, and that battles with the unconquerable forces—once, twice, a dozen, a hundred times—and goes down to apparently utter defeat, that finally will rise up out of the smoke and confusion of the conflict, a master of human affairs and a director of human destinies.

The man with a world vision necessarily must become the victim of many defeats before he can become a general of cosmic questions and movements and destinies. And unless he will consent to this course of training and refinement the latent forces of his life will forever lie dormant. Defeat is the tutor that develops alertness, discrimination, determination and mastery. Without it no great things can be done.

Search the annals of human history, and it will become evident that defeat was one of the most eloquent factors operative in the lives of the great men of the world. Would we have a Demosthenes to-day if unhindered success had been his lot? Could we turn with pride to a Socrates if his life had been a garden of roses and sunshine and ease? Could sacred history furnish the foundation of ancient and modern jurisprudence if Moses had leaped into unquestioned prominence at his first attempt in Egypt?

Suppose that Raphael had won fame when he first drew his brush across the canvas, and then imagine, if you can, such an immortal production as the Sistine Madonna! The Fifth and Ninth Symphonies of the noted Beethoven bespeak a multitude of lost chords. Thomas Carlyle's Sartor Resartus was the product of defeat. Hence in oratory, in philosophy, in jurisprudence, in art, in music and in literature, the individual who faced the stupendous and the unconquerable, who fell time after time, and who learned the lesson of triumph through defeat—he is the one who also received the awards of the immortal.

The same fact is true to-day. The reason that so few great leaders are in evidence in modern times is because men are too unwilling to face defeat and its cost. They seek the winning issue. And so long as defeat is despised, shunned and spurned, we need expect no great life to be evolved. Therefore it is necessary to face defeat, and to suffer humiliation, rather than sacrifice principles and ideals, for its reward is expressed in the word triumph!

Thomas Edison was once informed by a young lady that he certainly must have an abundance of inspiration to accomplish his wonderful feats in electrical appliances. To this he replied: "It is not inspiration that does it—but perspiration!" And behind that word "perspiration" there lies such an innumerable succession of exasperating defeats as would make the most of us stagger to the grave were we called upon to experience them. But therein lies triumph—and until we are willing to face the issue and suffer the consequences we shall remain destitute as a world-force, and useless as a factor in the upbuilding and cheering of human society.

Those who meet defeat with a brave heart will find that when it has done its worst they shall rise up and shout, "Defeated? Yes; defeated! But not conquered! A few more such blows and I shall triumph in my cause!"

Shelby, Ohio.

RURAL CHURCH AND COUNTRY LIFE

bounty of God's gracious providence, and he likes his pastor to feel it with him, so that both together may pray: 'Cause also the needful fruits of the earth to prosper that we may enjoy them in due season." But no farmer likes his minister to study agricultural journals rather than his church papers, "Soil Fertility and Permanent Agriculture" rather than his Bible.

I am therefore persuaded that the country church and its minister will fare best if, instead of trying to make everything revolve around the church as a community center, they will simply give intelligent and sympathetic co-operation and support to those agencies which are now working toward the reorganization of country life in America: the agricultural college, the agricultural high school, the demonstration work, the co-operative associations, the rural exchanges and the rural savings and credit societies. This they can do without any neglect of the things directly enjoined upon them by the Head of the church. These other things they cannot do without incurring the risk of the loss of strength and power, which is the inevitable result of doing those things which we are not called to do, rather than those things unto which we are directly called.

"Nothing I have taken for years has given me such a sense of vigor as Sanatogen"

—Olive Schreiner

BEHIND this statement from the gifted authoress is the untold story of a woman who no doubt had tried in vain many a "remedy." And she gratefully acknowledges that Sanatogen was the one thing which at last gave her that which was so eagerly sought—new vigor for nerve and brain, and with it all a new sense of physical and mental well-being.

It is this knowledge and certainty of Sanatogen's beneficent action, the grateful realization of its health-giving effects, that has made so many famous men and women publicly voice their testimony. The Rt. Rev. The Bishop of Southampton writes to say that he is glad to bear testimony to the value of Sanatogen as an invigorating tonic and restorative, while Col. Henry Watterson, the famous Editor, frankly states that he owes it to truth to report the good results of Sanatogen, without which he thinks he would not have recovered his vitality.

All these evidences of Sanatogen's merit find abundant confirmation in scientific circles—in the practices of a multitude of physicians—18,000 of whom have written in praise of Sanatogen. They have proved that Sanatogen does revitalize the nervous system—does impart new strength and vigor—does improve the appetite—digestion—sleep—that it does strengthen the very sources which make for health, strength, and long life. And because it has been proved—will it not do the same for you?

THE HORRORS OF WAR

As the Most Powerful Argument for Peace

DEAD IN THE WHEATFIELD, BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG

Over 30,000 Dead and Wounded on this Battlefield Alone

WILL OUR BOYS EVER HELP TO MAKE SUCH TERRIBLE AND AWFUL CARNAGE?

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured the exclusive magazine rights (for a limited time only) of a superb edition of which has been illustrated with over 1,500 of the choicest selections taken from the celebrated Brady War Photographs (used by special permission of the War Department).

In undertaking to give this great work as wide a distribution as is possible, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that in bringing before its readers such a true and accurate description of the real horrors of war, it will be doing more to advance the cause of PEACE than by any other method it could employ, and looks for the hearty support of its readers in this effort.

This great work has been completed after months of labor and an expense of thousands of dollars in its preparation, and the result is a magnificent book of great historic interest to all Americans.

Think of it! Copies of the real photographs "taken on the spot" by Mathew B. Brady and his men during the whole four years of the war. It was a feat without a parallel. General Grant saw many of the photographs taken, and in a letter in 1866 said: "The collection is valuable for the present generation, but how much more valuable for future generations!" General Grant joined Generals Butler and Garfield in stating that these negatives were worth $150,000. They are not merely imaginary sketches of what an artist might think, but real speaking likenesses of the great men who made history and the historical scenes and thrilling events of the time.

THE GOVERNMENT PAID $27,840 for these negatives, and they went into the archives of the War Department; but the people of the country never saw them. They were not serving their great educational purpose. The War Department granted permission to reproduce the photographs in this popular form, desiring to place them within the reach of all the people.

Sixteen Full-Color Plates

The work is further embellished with sixteen great battles and naval fights in full-color plates.

1. Grant in the Wilderness
2. Sheridan at Five Forks
3. Sherman at Kenesaw Mountain
4. Thomas at Chickamauga
5. Hooker at Chancellorsville
6. Meade at Gettysburg
7. McClellan at Antietam
8. Burnside at Fredericksburg
9. Battle of Shiloh
10. Sheridan's Charge at Winchester
11. Siege of Vicksburg
12. Battle of Gettysburg
13. Siege of Atlanta
14. Farragut at Mobile
15. The "Kearsarge" Sinking the "Alabama"
16. Battle of Spottsylvania

It is an amazing fact that fifty years after the war a faithful copy of the wonderful Brady War Pictures, taken at the risk of his life, can be obtained.

1,500 BRADY WAR Photographs

ILLUSTRATING

Lossing's Vivid History of the Civil War

Published in magnificent and permanent style. Printed on fine paper throughout and bound in fine cloth and half leather bindings with extra embossings. 512 pages, size 9x12 inches, weight 6 pounds or as much as any ordinary six-volume set of books.

BENSON J. LOSSING, LL.D.—author of A History of the Civil War, 1861-65—was more than a historian, more than an engaging writer. He was also a great authority; a court of last resort. He knew how to write history. Charles Dudley Warner said of him, "In reading the historical works of Lossing, one is amazed that any human being could carry so much information, and yet carry it so lightly."

The power to state facts accurately and yet to fill them with charm and interest is a gift that has been given to few men. Dr. Lossing had this supreme gift of the pen. Oliver Wendell Holmes said of him that he had done more than any other man to make history interesting and popular. Lossing was intimately acquainted with the great leaders of the country. He conversed with President Lincoln, Generals Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, and other great men of the time. He secured the stories and opinions of those who had been concerned in what he described. As we read, all is alive and real. The events, the battles of the war, the triumphs and defeats are told faithfully and vividly. The reader is carried on from page to page, from chapter to chapter, with an ever-compelling interest that makes it difficult to pause.

You will see through the pages reproductions of the war photographs taken fifty years ago of campgrounds, battlefields, regiments, hospitals, men in the trenches, dead, wounded, dying, and great leaders on both sides, all by the faithful reproduction of the famous Brady War negatives. Over 1,500 separate Brady War Photographs are shown in the work. There are 512 pages for the text, photographic reproductions from the Brady War Photographs, War Maps and Chronological Record from the Government Records in the War Department giving every engagement with names of troops on both sides and showing the total losses and casualties throughout the four years of the war.

The entire work is printed on fine enamel paper, in large and clear type specially made for the purpose. The engravings are made direct from the Brady photographs by the best engravers obtainable. The whole book is profusely illustrated with these engravings, scarcely a page being without illustration. Many of the photographs require full pages for themselves. These photographs show the great scenes throughout the four years of the war and are of extraordinary historic interest at this time.

THE YOUNG PEOPLE'S MEETINGS

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Pursuing Peace*

IT IS very appropriate that this lesson should come at a time when so much is being said about peace. The Fourth American Peace Congress has just been held at St. Louis; a commission, composed of distinguished men, has been visiting America to plan for the celebration, in 1915, of a century of peace between England and the United States; at the beginning of July a great festival will be held at Gettysburg in which the small remnants of the great armies which met in cruel conflict there just fifty years ago will meet again in peace and brotherhood. The Senate is probably about to adopt a suggestion, made by Secretary Bryan and endorsed by President Wilson, that the United States enter into new treaty relations with the various nations, agreeing, when a dispute arises, to delay a declaration of war until from six months to a year has been spent in investigating the cause of disagreement and trying to reach an amicable adjustment. The Peace Movement is one in which every young soldier of Christ's army should be deeply interested. He is the Prince of Peace, and pronounced a special blessing upon the "peacemakers." In all our dealings with people, in business and socially, we should, as we come more and more to take influential positions, be outspoken for the theory of international peace and do all we can to influence the thought of the world in favor of it. War is coming to be recognized more and more as a hideous, inhuman thing. Under the leadership of Jesus the members of the human race must find the saner and milder ways of settling their disputes.

But it is not only among nations that we are to seek peace. Various interests and factions of our own nation are at odds, and, while not counseling that any group of men should surrender their principles, we must urge them, so far as possible, to use the gentler rather than the harsher measures of persuasion.

Then, too, among our friends and in our homes, we must be friends of peace. It is shocking that in so many Christian homes there are bickerings and harsh disagreements. Even churches are often tormented by factional strifes, and—I suppose—it is not altogether unheard of for a young people's society to have occasional dissensions.

All this is too bad. Christians are people who are pursuing peace, and we surely ought to be able to get along among ourselves without strife. If we really followed the principle that Jesus laid down and that Paul emphasized, we should have just the other end of striving—each one trying to cease and serve and help his brother and trying to fix things so that his brother would have his way rather than that he should have his own. It is quite likely that a revival would break out soon in the society or the church that started in to live and work like that. Yet it is very sad that such a thing should seem strange and unlikely when it is precisely the way that Jesus so distinctly told us to live.

But in studying this lesson we must not omit the still deeper problem of personal peace. If we are to be peacemakers, pursuing peace at home and abroad, we must have peace in our own souls. And here the word "pursue" is hardly satisfactory, for this sort of peace we do not gain by pursuing. It is the gift of God, the fruit of the Spirit, the blessing that Jesus gives to his friends. We find it, not by seeking it, but by seeking him. He gives us pardon for our sins, and we have peace with God; he gives us his love, and we have the peace of God in our hearts; he gives us strength and courage and hope and counsel, so that in the midst of life's troubles and perplexities we may have his peace within. It was at a moment of great turmoil and disaster that he said to his disciples: "My peace I give unto you." Have you let him give you this gracious gift?

The Complete Man*

WHEN men are building a machine they have a standard to which they must conform. The machine must be able to do certain things, and when it can do them as its designer intended it is called a perfect machine. Some pieces of modern mechanism are almost miraculous in their precision. Delicate armatures do the work of human fingers; false weights are detected; imperfect material rejected; the machine seems to think; its work is flawless.

Now if all this is true of a machine it is reasonable to expect that God has provided for the attainment of some sort of perfection in this present life. It is in this world that the Christian must live his life and do his work; and we may expect to be provided with adequate equipment for the work we have to do. A hint of God's plan for thus equipping us is found in Ezekiel 36: 27: "I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." Paul declares, in our first reference, Col. 4: 12, that Epaphras was constantly praying for the Christians at Colosse that they might "stand perfect and complete in all the will of God." In our last reference, II Tim. 3: 17, he declares the purpose of Scripture to be that "the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works."

The whole Bible, particularly the New Testament, clearly teaches a kind of perfection as attainable in this life. This was the cardinal doctrine of Methodism in its early days and is still adhered to in the doctrinal standards of the church. It is not a difficult doctrine when fairly understood, and the Epworth League could do no greater service to the church than to revive the faith and experience of this sacred truth. The doctrine should always be studied in connection with the passages which state and describe the power of Christ's blood to cleanse the soul from sin. See especially I John 1: 9; Zech. 13: 1; Heb. 13: 20, 21; Heb. 10: 14; Rom. 6: 6. Sin mars the human soul so that its motives and purposes are all awry. Jesus, by the power of his death, removes this principle and purifies our motives and intentions, and gives us, through the gift of the Holy Spirit, the power that we need for our work.

* "THE COMPLETE MAN." Epworth League Topic for Sunday, June 8, 1913. Col. 4: 12; II Tim. 2: 15; 3: 17. (Christian Culture Sunday.)

"There goes a Handsome Couple!"

"And They Used To Be So Thin"

THEY are contented, capable and resourceful, because their bodies are well nourished—clothed with the right amount of solid, healthy flesh.

They are not thin, nervous, and lacking in vital force; they are not wanting in that substantial backing that can only come from a physique fortified for any task requiring confidence and reserve strength.

There is a positive adjustment of that interdependence of good mind and good body.

The beauty of perfect health and perfect physical development is irresistibly attractive—everybody admires it, many envy it and all strive for it.

No Thin Man or Woman Should Miss This Opportunity

Wouldn't you like to be every inch a man or a woman—to have the steady nerves and faculty of accomplishment associated with normal weight and physical charm?

Then we invite you to try Sargol—the new flesh-forming discovery—Sargol, that, as hundreds will testify, puts pounds of solid healthy flesh and tissue on people who are thin and under weight.

Sargol is the new regenerative force for thin, nervous people. It is a scientific assimilative agent that works on the principle that thin people stay thin because they cannot absorb the flesh-forming elements of the food they eat. Sargol comes in the form of tiny tablets which you take—one at every meal—so that the fats, sugars, starches and muscle-building protein of your food may make sound healthy fat and tissue upon your body. It aims to save food waste, to force your food to renew the red corpuscles in your blood, to strengthen your nerves and put your digestive tract in shape to assimilate full nourishment from all you eat. Its sole purpose is to Increase Weight by Creating New Healthy Fat—Fat that means better looks, better health, stronger body, more active brain and a perfectly proportioned figure. That it succeeds is best attested by those who have used it; hundreds stating they have increased their weight from 10 to 30 lbs

50c BOX GIVEN FOR TRIAL

Let us prove to you, at our expense, that SARGOL is what we claim it to be. All that we ask is a fair trial. To convince you and show our faith in SARGOL we will send you, on request, a full-size 50c package absolutely free. With the package we will send you a booklet containing much valuable information about nutrition, together with letters from users of SARGOL. Write to-day for FREE package, enclosing, if you please, 10c to help pay postage, packing, etc.

Ministers, Physicians, Scientists, and other well-known people endorse Sargol

Just read the letters herewith:

Rev. George W. Davis Says:

"I have made a faithful trial of the Sargol treatment and must say that it has brought me new life and vigor. I have gained twenty pounds and now weigh 170 pounds, and, what is better, I have gained the days of my boyhood. It has been the turning point of my life."

Mrs. A. I. Rodenheiser Writes:

"I have gained immensely since I took Sargol, for I only weighed about 106 pounds when I began using it, and now I weigh 130 pounds, so really this makes 24 pounds. I feel stronger and am feeling better than ever before, and now I carry rosy cheeks, which is something I could never say before."

Clay Johnson Says:

"Please send me another ten-day treatment. I am well pleased with Sargol. It has been the light of my life. I am getting back to my proper weight again. When I began to take Sargol I only weighed 138 pounds, and now, four weeks later, I am weighing 153 pounds and feeling fine."

Sample—Sargol Analysis No 7691
Recd. March 7, 1909.

After an exhaustive analysis of samples I found they contain no Morphine, Opium, Cocaine, Mercury, nor any Narcotic or Poisonous ingredients. In my opinion Sargol contains the best elements to accomplish what is claimed for it. Sargol is a superior preparation. I recommend Sargol as a safe Vitalizer and Flesh Builder.

Respectfully submitted,

Serve Two
With Cream and Sugar

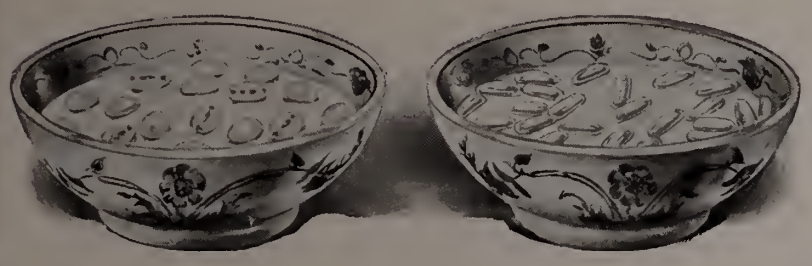
Puffed Wheat and Rice--the exploded grains—are filled with a myriad cells.

Each cell is surrounded by thin toasted walls, which melt away into almond-flavored granules.

In the morning, served with cream and sugar, these are royal dishes.

Two with Fruit
Note the Nut-Like Blend

Puffed Wheat and Rice taste much like toasted nuts. That's due to terrific heat. Mixed with berries, or with any fruit, they add a delicious blend.



Two at Night
Floating in Bowls of Milk

Puffed Wheat and Rice are eight times normal size—four times as porous as bread.

They float like bubbles in a bowl of milk.

These are whole grains made wholly digestible. Crisp, airy, toasted wafers.

No other grain-made morsels are so delightful, or so easy to digest.

The Other Four

Use the rest like nut-meats in cake frosting, or as garnish to ice cream.

Or use in making Puffed Rice candy. Directions are on the package.

Or let the children eat them dry, like peanuts, when at play.

Thus these ten dishes will reveal to you the endless fascinations of Puffed Grains.

All because these enticing foods tell you more than words can tell.

Thus we spread to countless new homes one of the great food delights of the century.

Prof. Anderson Wishes You to Know

Prof. A. P. Anderson, who invented these foods, wishes every home to know them.

For these Puffed Grains are scientific foods, despite all their fascination.

Every food granule has been blasted to pieces, so digestion can instantly act.

Inside of each grain there occurs, in the making, 125,000,000 explosions.

The process is this:

The grains are sealed up in mammoth bronze-steel guns. Then the guns are revolved for 60 minutes in a heat of 550 degrees.

Each grain contains not less than 125,000,000 granules. Inside of each granule there's a trifle of moisture, and this heat turns that moisture to steam.

When the steam pressure reaches 175 pounds, the guns are unsealed and the grains are exploded. Each granule is blasted into countless atoms. The grains are puffed to eight times normal size.

Yet the grains come out, shaped as they grew, with their coats unbroken.

Thus are created the best-cooked foods in existence. No other process makes grain so digestible. Serve any hour, from morning to bedtime, for these foods don't tax the stomach.

From the expert's standpoint these exploded grains form the greatest of food inventions.

IN the care of plants, that advice which you have heard in numerous other instances applies equally well: "When in doubt, use Ivory Soap." And the reasons are the same.

Because of its purity, mildness and freedom from alkali, there is no soap safer than Ivory. It can be used wherever water can be used. And its purity has the additional value of giving it strong insecticidal properties, thus making it not only an ideal cleanser for the tenderest plants but a safeguard against plant pests as well.

The directions below should give you excellent results. They are followed by plant lovers everywhere.

1st. To keep the leaves clean: Wash once a week with a weak suds of Ivory Soap and lukewarm water, applying with a sponge or soft cloth.

2nd. To guard against insects: Spray stems and leaves once a month or oftener if necessary with a solution made by dissolving half a cake of Ivory Soap shaved fine in a quart of boiling water and adding four gallons of cold water. Apply with whisk broom, spray or watering can, then rinse with clear water a half-hour later.

3rd. To keep the roots free from worms and bugs: Pour around the base of the plant the Ivory Soap suds from the laundry or dishpan.

THE FIELD OF THE GREAT CONFLICT AT GETTYSBURG AS IT IS TO-DAY

GETTYSBURG—FIFTY YEARS AFTER

THE VETERANS OF THE BLUE AND GRAY TO MEET IN FRIENDSHIP ON THE BATTLEFIELD OF '63

IN a peaceful valley lying between twin ridges of the South Mountains at Gettysburg, Pa., just forty-nine years and eleven months ago, was fought the greatest battle of the Civil War. For three terrible days the conflict raged on the meadows and hillslopes, the advantage lying first on one side and then on the other, with Hill at Willoughby's Run and Reynolds in McPherson's Grove, with Longstreet in the Wheatfield and the Peach Orchard, and with Slocum on Culp's Hill, until at last came Pickett's magnificent charge, ending in defeat. Immediately after the great battle the army of Lee retired from Pennsylvania and the tide of the Confederacy, although it was pressed with vigor, never again rolled as high as it did at Gettysburg.

A month hence the Blue and the Gray will meet again on the famous battlefield—this time to cement the ties which half a century ago they fought to sever. Practically all of the living survivors of the three days' struggle, some fifty thousand in number, will be present at a great semi-centennial reunion which is to be held at Gettysburg from July 1 to July 4. It will be, without doubt, the most notable gathering of its kind, and the last—since the veterans of the '60's are fast departing; and for this reason the government as well as the veterans' organizations plan to make the occasion a memorable one.

In accepting the invitation to take part in the Gettysburg commemorative jubilee, General Walker, of the Confederate Veterans, declared to his former companions-in-arms: "Your commander feels that the time has come when, by invitation of our one-time foes, we can unite with them in celebrating that permanent peace which we pray may forever bless this our great and glorious country." General Trimble of the G. A. R. sent greetings to the former Confederate leader saying: "Let us assemble there and inaugurate a great peace movement under which shall be entombed forever any lingering prejudices and bitterness, to symbolize to all our people and to the generations yet to be that even out of the dead dust and ashes of war under the sunlight of our Christian civilization the fragrant flowers of peace and amity may grow and bloom."

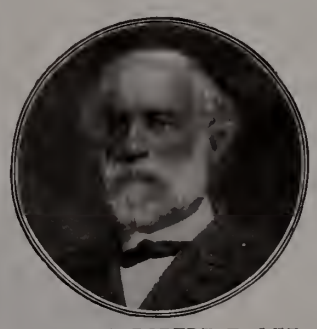
GENERAL GEORGE PICKETT

As soon as the project was launched, it assumed national proportions. Recognizing its importance the government immediately consented to participate, appropriating $350,000 for the purpose, and practically every State in the Union has responded to the appeal for funds. As a result the veterans of both North and South will be sent to the scene of the great battle without expense, and during the week while they are quartered at Gettysburg they will be hospitably entertained at no cost to themselves. Surrounded with every possible safeguard for their health and well-being, the gallant soldier boys of fifty years ago will gather again on the historic field, and, without hatred or enmity, live over again the experiences of those bitter days in July, '63, thanking God at the end that they and their fellow countrymen have been able to merge their differences of yesterday in their common hopes of to-morrow.

GENERAL GEORGE G. MEADE

The celebration to take place at Gettysburg originated with the Pennsylvania Commission, which has been the leading force in preparing for the event. The State commission, known as the "Fiftieth Anniversary of the Battle of Gettysburg Commission," includes Colonel J. M. Schoonbecker, chairman; Lieutenant Colonel Louis E. Beitler, secretary; General B. Dixon, Colonel R. Bruce Ricketts, Major Alexander MacDowell, Corporal Irwin K. Campbell, Captain W. J. Patterson, Captain W. E. Miller, Captain G. F. Baer and General John P. Green.

The Congressional Commission, whose pictures appear on the following page, is made up of an equal number of Union and Confederate veterans, with one non-veteran Congressional representative. Originally the celebration was designed chiefly in the interest of the old soldiers, but the national importance of the occasion has come to overshadow the first plan, and it has finally taken the form of a great peace memorial. In addition to the veterans it is estimated that more than 250,000 visitors will come from all parts of the country to witness the ceremonies.



GENERAL ROBERT E. LEE

A word of warning should be inserted here for the benefit of those who contemplate making the trip. Do not expect to stay in Gettysburg over night. The town contains only three or four small hotels, and they have already been engaged to their full capacity. Private houses will be unable to furnish sleeping quarters and the accommodations in nearby towns are by no means adequate.

So far as the veterans are concerned, it is different. They will be cared for in an improvised camp of more than six thousand tents, where their wants will be looked after by the government itself. This immense city of a week, occupying more than twenty acres, has been planned with the utmost consideration for the comfort of the old soldiers, for it is realized that they are no longer able to withstand the rigors of rough camp life. The camp will be laid out in broad avenues, lined with wall tents and lighted at night by tungsten lamps. The arrangements are in charge of two of the most experienced men in the Quartermaster's Department of the United States Army—a wise provision, since the problem of feeding this army of 50,000 will be a large matter in itself. For this purpose four hundred great army cooking ranges and outfits will be installed in the camp; with a chief commissary, eighteen assistant commissaries, eight hundred cooks, eight hundred assistant cooks and one hundred and thirty bakers. Nearly one and one-half million pounds of food of various kinds will be consumed during the week, at an estimated cost of thirty cents for each ration. Outside the camp a large hospital will be established, while inside will be located eighty-seven field hospitals and infirmary tents with one hundred and thirty surgeons and attendants.

The program for the four days' celebration at Gettysburg has been tentatively arranged as follows:

First Day, July 1, Veterans' Day—All surviving veterans to be participants in a great camp-fire, presided over by the commanders-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic and the United Confederate Veterans.

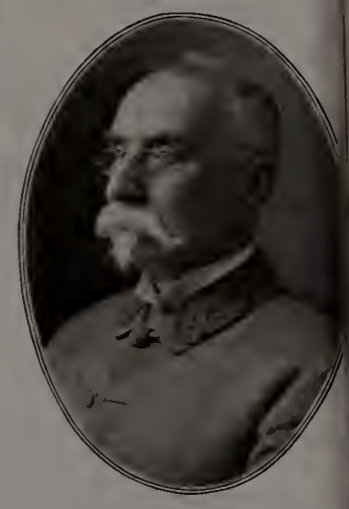
Second Day, July 2, Military Day—Exercises to be under the command of the chief of staff of the United States Army. Special detachments of each branch of the army to be detailed by the secretary of war, and representatives of the National Guard of the States to be chosen and invited for merit.

Third Day, July 3, Civic Day—Under the personal supervision of the governor of Pennsylvania, the participants to be the governors of States, their staffs and the general public.

Fourth Day, July 4, National Day — The chief justice of the Supreme Court to preside, and the President, Vice-President, the cabinet, the justices of the Supreme Court, the speaker of the House of Representatives and the Congressional Committee to be the guests of honor. At 10 o'clock A.M. a great mass meeting will be held at the rostrum, at which prayer will be offered, singing by a great chorus and the people will be rendered and an oration delivered by the President of the United States. At noon, the cornerstone of a great peace memorial will be laid by the President, which act will conclude the official exercises.

The veteran who fifty years ago fought on the famous battlefield will not find as many changes as he might expect. The fields over which the men of the North and South struggled so desperately remain practically unchanged. There still is the Peach Orchard, the Wheatfield, the Cordovi House, which split Pickett's division in its great charge. Aside from new roads built by the government and monuments, tablets and memorials that have been erected by patriotic and admiring citizens, the field is as it was in the long-gone yesterday and the veteran who visits it again can easily rebuild in his imagination the events that transpired there fifty years ago.

He can again picture that first day of July when Buford's cavalry came into contact with Heth's Confederate division just beyond the town and, step by step, were driven back, even after the arrival of Reynolds and Doubleday and Howard, until the entire Union forces had retreated through Gettysburg to Cemetery Hill, where they awaited the developments of the morrow. He can follow the giant fish-hook crest of Cemetery Ridge, where Meade's line of battle was drawn up on the second day, and again witness the terrible scenes that were enacted in the Wheatfield and the Peach Orchard, at Devil's Den—well-named spot—and Plum Run, where thousands of the boys in blue and gray laid down their lives. This time he will see the Union line, though it is hard pressed at many points, standing fast along the ridge until nightfall brings an end to the roar and slaughter of the battle. He will again wait through the long ominous hours of silence that preceded the terrible cannonade of the third day, when more than three hundred guns shook the hills from crest to base; and finally he will look upon the splendid charge of Pickett and his men, as they emerge from the pall of smoke that covers Longstreet's lines, moving forward to the assault like an army on dress parade. He will see them form and reform their gray ranks under the rain of shot and canister, grim, determined, advancing steadily in the face of the most terrific fire ever poured upon living men, until they actually pierce Hancock's line and Armistead falls mortally wounded. Then at last the gray lines break, and a mere remnant of Pickett's glory-crowned division makes its way down the mile-long slope again. The battle is over. In the face of dauntless courage and superhuman heroism the hand of Providence has reached out to preserve for these embattled thousands and their descendants the heritage of a common country.



GENERAL C. IRVINE WALKER
Commander-in-Chief U. C. V.

In his war-time letters to his wife, which, just fifty years after Gettysburg, have been published under the title, The Heart of a Soldier, General Pickett tells the story of his famous charge on the third day of the battle. Pickett's division did not reach the scene of the conflict until the night of July 2, having been held in reserve at Chambersburg. Upon reporting to General Lee, the division was assigned immediately to make the assault whose failure decided the battle, and as it later proved, the fate of the South. The following letter was written just before Pickett gave the order to charge. He handed it to General Longstreet to be delivered to his promised wife in the event of his death. A corner of the envelope bore the penciled inscription: "If Old Peter's nod means death, then good-by, little one, and God bless you."

"We have been on the qui vive, sweetheart, since midnight and as early as three o'clock were on the march. About half past three, Gary's pistol signaled the Yankees' attack upon Culp's Hill, and with its echo

NEW YORK'S CIVIC PARADE

ON SATURDAY, May 17, New York saw, for the first time, a parade of some 12,000 marching men, six and a half miles in length, members of nineteen municipal departments. It was reviewed by Mayor Gaynor from a stand two blocks in length, well filled by invited guests, in spite of the rain that came down continuously. The three most conspicuous divisions of the parade were those of the firemen, the police and the "White Wings" (street cleaners). Each section of the marching host carried devices giving information as to its work, and showing its contribution to good citizenship.

There were many special features that greatly added to the interest aroused all along the line of march—some of them possessing strong human appeal. One of these consisted of two large sight-seeing cars filled with men, women and children, of many ages, and widely varying stations in life, whose lives had been saved by members of the Fire Department. Conspicuous among these was Judge Conrad, of the Supreme Court of Delaware. Immediately preceding them marched 125 of the medal men—firemen who wore such honors as the Bennett and the Bonner medals for saving life. These numbered in their ranks men with whitening hair, and others still endowed with youth and vigor. Then there was a battalion of nineteen firemen who have been in the service for thirty-five years and longer.

Nor must the four-footed members be forgotten. There were a score of "mascot" dogs, each having a special uniformed "keeper" for the occasion; and also eight fire horses from 22 to 27 years old. The leader, Abbott, has responded to 2,090 alarms, and is still in active service.

The relatively prosaic services rendered by the city tenement house inspectors, the Department of Bridges, the Department of Charities were represented by uniformed men, and a number of nurses whose good looks made one inclined to envy the patients who profited by their ministrations. Exhibits of many phases of municipal effort in the fields of sanitation, prison work, hospital work, and even in the domains of agriculture and floriculture were also included in the division that was followed by 1,700 marchers and 350 vehicles, representing the Street Cleaning Department. Their marching was as perfect as that of regular troops. The Park Department of New York and Brooklyn sent artistic floats and exhibits, and some 400 of the aqueduct police, mounted on roan horses, attracted much attention. The 7,224 men of the Police Department were led by about fifty honor men. Each regiment of the division had its own flag, and many were led by a brass band. The mounted men and bicycle and motorcycle squads brought up the rear. The general opinion was that "the finest" had never shown off to greater advantage.

ARMAMENTS AND ARBITRATION

A GROUP OF THE DELEGATES AT THE NINETEENTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE ON INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION AT LAKE MOHONK

THREE hundred delegates gathered on May 14 at Lake Mohonk, N. Y., for the first of the three days' sessions of the nineteenth annual conference on international arbitration. Following the custom of his late brother, Albert K. Smiley, who founded the conference, Daniel Smiley delivered an opening address of welcome and expressed his hope for a profitable meeting.

Dr. Lyman Abbott presided at the opening session and addressed the gathering on international justice and arbitration. Dr. Abbott's speech was followed with intense interest, as it was his first public utterance on the peace movement since his name was stricken from the roster and honorary vice-presidential roll of the American Peace Society. Dr. Abbott's friendly attitude toward national armament was given as the cause for this removal. In the Lake Mohonk speech he contended that lasting world-wide peace could be secured only by establishing world-wide justice. Until that is done armaments are a necessity, he believes. He continued: "Christians have not stood and ought not to stand for peace at any price. They have recognized and they ought to recognize that there are worse things than war, bad as war is. It is quite possible to pay too high a price for peace. Our fathers would have paid too high a price if, in 1776, they had bartered liberty for peace. The generation of the Civil War would have paid too high a price if, for the sake of peace, they had allowed the country to be rent in twain and a great slave empire to be founded, extending from the Ohio River to the Gulf of Mexico, and perhaps including Mexico and Central America."

Later, he said: "When a plan for securing justice was proposed that promised to avoid the tragedy of war, mankind began to listen. The proposal is nothing less than a substitution of an appeal to reason for the appeal to force. Before this substitute can be successfully adopted three conditions are necessary. There must be developed in the civilized nations a sense of justice strong enough to overcome race, religious and national prejudices. This international conscience must create some permanent tribunal which can give it official and authoritative expression. And there must be developed in every nation such a sense of honor that, having once submitted a question to this tribunal, its decision will be accepted, not perhaps without criticism, but without resistance or serious complaint."

His attitude on armament was outlined as follows: "It is the first duty of a government to protect its people in the enjoyment of life and liberty. If it fails to afford such protection it has no right to exist. America, therefore, must have an army sufficient in size, equipment and efficiency to protect its citizens from violence at home, and a navy sufficient to protect its coast and its commerce from attack and to enable it to take its share in the fulfilment of those world obligations which belong to all the civilized nations on the earth."

Professor William R. Shepherd of Columbia University and Henri Bourassa, one of the Canadian delegates, spoke on the Monroe Doctrine and its application to America's present duties and needs and the general international political situation.

"How to Root Out the Causes of War" was the subject of Dr. Charles W. Eliot's address. He said this could be accomplished only by a combination of popular education; the progress of international law; the acceptance of the "open-door" policy; the increase of good will among the nations and the focusing of attention upon war's wastes and brutality.

The last day of the conference was occupied very largely by a discussion of the Panama Canal tolls problem. Both sides of the now well-known subject were represented, though the arguments seemed to favor those who contend that even despite the recent legislation in Washington the United States must find some way of arranging this difficulty other than a direct violation of the promise of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which provides that the canal shall be "free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality."

PARSON PICKARD'S MISSIONARY BOX

BY ELIZABETH D. YORKER

A Story Complete in This Issue

AS THE Rev. Silas Pickard vigorously wiped the great beads of perspiration from his brow, he was free to admit it had been a very strenuous and trying day. This was his second funeral. As each of his bereaved parishioners lived at remote distances, and at opposite points of the compass, he had been obliged to make an early start, for his only means of transport was Peggoty, an antiquated old nag.

It was well along in the afternoon when he left the little cemetery after performing the last rites over poor old Ann Eliza Ostrom. There were no tears or regrets observable among the small group of mourners—only feelings of relief that she was at rest after four long years of patient, bedridden misery and suffering.

Rev. Silas felt almost guilty at his own sense of relief, for now there would be no further necessity for those weekly trips over eight long miles of rough mountain roads to visit her and administer spiritual comfort. Then, too, it would mean less wear and tear to his buggy, and that was an important item to consider. The wornout old vehicle was evidently a matter of vital concern to him as he jogged slowly homeward, driving carefully to avoid the deep ruts and sharp turns, but in spite of his vigilance it continued to display marked symptoms that aroused in his mind vague doubts as to its future utility. Its constant creaking and groaning, as if vainly protesting against further action, grated ominously on his ear. Suddenly it parted company with one of the rear wheels—there was a snap—then came the crash that announced the final dissolution.

Peggoty obligingly came to a standstill, as was her habit on the slightest provocation, and turned her head serenely to see what it was all about. The parson, somewhat startled and bruised, extricated himself from the débris and ruefully surveyed the wreck. The situation was a humorous reminder of the historical deacon and his one-hoss shay, while at the same time it was to him something little less than a tragedy as he realized what its loss would mean.

With his little flock widely scattered throughout the country region, a conveyance was a positive necessity. He could see no way of replacing it, for his meagre salary of $40 a month left no margin for such expenditures. Indeed, it hardly sufficed for the barest necessaries of life.

His weariness was evident as he stooped to remove the splintered remains of the old buggy to one side of the road. He turned and eyed his horse dubiously. In his present state of mind and body a ride of eight miles on her back did not present an alluring prospect. Peggoty entertained pronounced objections to such mode of travel and was prone to discourage it by assuming an exasperating and racking gait not unlike that of the camel. But her master could see no alternative, so he braced himself for the ordeal, mounted her, and continued on his way homeward.

It was not until the evening meal that he apprised his family of his mishap. He first opened and read a letter that awaited him, then passed it over for his wife to read aloud. It was from the Ladies' Aid Society of a prominent church of Oakland, California, conveying the welcome announcement that they were planning to send him a missionary box. He was requested to reply immediately with a list of the family's most urgent needs.

John and Teddy, two rosy-cheeked youngsters of nine and twelve, were the first to enthuse over the contents of the letter.

"I hope they send us some more of those dandy picture cards!" said Teddy gleefully, with joyous recollections of a box that had come to them some two years previous. That had seemed at first to be a most promising box, its sides fairly bulging with imaginary treasure, but when opened the greater part of its contents were found to consist of old magazines, calendars and showy picture cards. These were greatly appreciated by the boys, who at once proceeded to use them to decorate the walls of their bare little room.

"I shall be quite sure to inform them of my age," declared Marion, a tall graceful girl of sixteen, who also cherished vivid memories of that other box, particularly of her keen disappointment on catching a glimpse of some ravishing lingerie and gingham dresses, then discovering them to be a five-year-old size.

The little mother had carefully refrained from any comments or criticism, for she knew the box had been sent by a society of inexperienced young people, and it had really contained a number of useful articles. For instance, that nice long warm coat had been of untold service to her. Why, she had fairly lived in it. To be sure, more than once she had secretly wished that the donor had not found it necessary to remove the rows of buttons that originally decorated each side of the front, or, if so, that she had observed a little care in the removal process. A poor minister's wife, however, must be a person of fertile resources, so it did not take her long to darn and patch neatly the rows of unsightly holes from which generous fragments of the material were missing. These were then cleverly concealed by tiny rosettes she had evolved from a bolt of narrow velvet ribbon some one had thoughtfully placed in the box.

A reminiscent smile lighted her pale features as her thoughts reverted to the black broadcloth suit they had sent to Silas, and the fun they had when he first tried it on. The former owner was evidently a man short of stature and wide of girth, while Silas was tall and lean. The two might have posed for an illustration of "the long and short of it."

Should she ever forget the struggle of trying to make the suit wearable for Silas? The alteration of the frock coat and vest was an easy matter, but when it came to the trousers, then her heart failed her. However, her resourcefulness again came to her aid, and the task was finally accomplished by letting out the hems at the bottom and introducing at the top a deep yoke, evolved from surplus material taken from the width.

When he was arrayed in the suit, Silas certainly presented an appearance of genteel clerical dignity. She was in deadly fear, though, lest he might unwittingly expose her little artifice, for when he warmed up in his preaching he had a habit of reaching frantically around for his handkerchief, which usually reposed in his hip pocket. To avert any such dire possibility, she prudently removed all of his pockets, and as an added precaution, had wisely stitched the coattails together half way down.

"Rouse up, Mumsey!" shouted her daughter

THE FIRST DUTY OF THE INJURED

A SERMON

By

Rev. Charles F. Slattery, D.D.*

TEXT: "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." Matt. 18: 15

YOU have heard St. Paul's description of Love. (I Cor. 13.) Love is one of those tremendous words which, baffling all definition, thrill us with their power and their reality. No description is adequate. You know some of these words—God, religion, country, friendship. All these names stand for something greater than we can fully comprehend; yet we know them better, more intensely, than we know anything else in all life. Any one who sat down deliberately to define them would surely come to a ridiculous end. But now and then, under stress of some significant and overwhelming moment, a great soul has given us a vivid sketch of one of these sublime words. For example, it was Abraham Lincoln, bowed with a sense of a nation's sacrifice, who, standing on the battlefield of Gettysburg, defined patriotism in words at once so simple and so deep that they never can be forgotten. A few years ago learned explorers entered an Egyptian tomb which had been sealed three thousand years before. They found the marvelously carved sarcophagus of a little child, which they were about to remove for a famous museum. Then they paused, and deciphered the inscription, which read, "O my life, my love, my little one! Would God I had died for thee!" In these words, carved thirty centuries ago, they read a description of love. Instantly they uncovered their heads and tears were on their cheeks. In silence they went out and sealed the tomb. Nothing should invade that place of love. In a mood as profound as that, St. Paul must have written this thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians. There is no studied balancing of phrases. There is no attempt at completeness. There is only the rushing, mighty impulse of his whole nature to tell his Corinthian parishioners what love is. And all the years since, men have recognized these words as among the great words of all time. "Here at last," they have cried, "is a description of love."

It would be profitable to take up this wonderful chapter phrase by phrase. But I am going to draw your attention to one or two sentences only, to tell you what happens to real Love when it is obliged to go through hard places. Let me read to you the quality which Love manifests when so besieged: "Love suffereth long . . . is not provoked . . . beareth all things."

Tests of Love

It seems then, in the first place, that a person may be quite loving and lovable, and yet have people all about him who inflict injuries, who provoke, who impose burdens upon his extremest patience. Love is not a soft quality which stupidly ignores all that goes on at its door. It is keen. It feels weariness, insult, peevishness, uncongenial surroundings, quite as much as self-centeredness. Even love cannot control the neighborhood and the atmosphere.

Think of two or three illustrations. If there is one class of men and women to whom a community owes more than to another it is the men and women who give their lives to teaching. Imagine, then, a teacher who has been giving himself as thoroughly as possible to his pupils. By deliberate, deep-seated purpose, he has tried to let his friendship go out to them. He has tried to treat them as friends, for such, in spite of youth and immaturity, he has really counted them. They have received his kindness, let us say, calmly and complacently. He begins to think the friendship mutual when some day, by chance, he overhears a harsh remark about himself, describing him as a hypocrite trying to be popular, or an ingenious spy probing the secrets of the school. It sends an icy chill down a man's back. The love in his nature is apt to freeze over, as it were. And it would not be unnatural if he determined to reserve his friendship for the exclusive one or two whom he could certainly trust.

Or, think of an illustration much commoner. In most households, and I suppose in all institutions, there is at least one person who is crabbed. It is apt to be a person not quite well physically; it is even more apt to be a person who is selfish. When at a sufficient distance we smile over the cutting words and the insolent bearing. But should we be called to live with such a person day after day, very likely we should discover how wretched it all really is. Perhaps every other sentence we spoke would draw down on our heads some bitter criticism; or every day or two the house would be pervaded by a silent gloom because the difficult person had taken offense at we knew not what and in morose stubbornness refused to speak, except in monosyllables, answering only the most necessary questions. In other words, we should be treated as criminals: ignored for the most part, we should be living in the tense air just before a thunderstorm. Even Love is apt to become just a little frosty in such an atmosphere. "There is no excuse for it," Love says; and Love is quite accurate; it is beyond reason.

One more illustration must suffice. There is no person who does not, sooner or later, meet the kindly soul who enters where angels refuse to come, and makes a delicate situation impossible. Many a man has done his fine hard task to find its usefulness ruined the next day by some officious meddler, who came to add a few strokes to its completeness. The mischief was done instantly: no harm was intended. But the fact remains: with perfect good-nature and the utmost kindness the good deed is spoiled. Love finds its hardest work to keep serene under such conditions.

There then you have three exceedingly common illustrations of the test to which love is frequently put. You know, I am sure, that because a man has Love well lodged in his heart, he is not therefore immune from all that is painful and disagreeable. The question now arises what Love is to do under such trying circumstances.

Love's Sublime Hardiness

I suspect that most people would say that it was now time, conditions being thus and so, for Love to exercise a little righteous indignation. Why be fretted by the perpetually crabbed being who is always either losing his temper or shutting himself up to sullen silence? Why be any longer annoyed by the suspicious, hardened worldling who believes Love a dream for callow youth? Why longer be bothered by the doltish creatures who mean well, but whose friendship, true as it is in its intention, is a constant menace to our usefulness in the world?

"Now you are being sensible!" cries the man who boasts of his common sense. "Give up your Quixotic notions. Love is intended only for those who are perpetually agreeable. It was never meant to be given to those who, longing for it, thrust in our faces their most obnoxious traits. Let Love build its fences and be like the sensible people of our Saviour's day who saluted their brethren only. Who cares about the reward?"

So the world. Now think of St. Paul. Shall Love yield to such smug maxims of ease? "Never!" is St. Paul's ringing answer: "Love suffereth long; . . . Love is not provoked; . . . Love beareth all things." See what Love is. It is not an insipid quality. It is not a fragile, ease-loving flower, which thrives only in sunny weather. It is something sublimely hard, which survives in all its grace and beauty when the storms of provocation, distrust and wilful harm beat against it. Love, which seems so blithe and simple, is the most difficult quality in life, because it must control not its outward demeanor only, but the inmost feeling and thought. To play at Love is not difficult, if one be clever at acting, and many are quite clever in the rôle for a little while at a time; but to think Love, to feel Love, when conditions are austere and cruel, requires all that is Christlike—it requires that in a man which is Christ—the Son of the Living God—Love made flesh.

"Be Reconciled to Thy Brother"

All this, you will say, is still putting the matter in large terms. Let us then take one simple rule for retaining Love in bleak conditions. It is the rule of Christ, which I put at the beginning of this sermon. See how direct it is: "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." Let us reflect upon this.

When we have offended, when we know that we have done a friend an injury, our duty is clear. It is to go to him as soon as possible, and, frankly confessing our fault, ask his generous pardon. But when, after searching our minds, we can think of n wrong which we have done, and when we see wit distinctness that we have been injured; then we ar apt to think, are we not, that the time has come t exercise that quality most sacred to pride which w call dignity. We hold our heads quite high, we ar quite placid and self-contained, and we say to our selves that we do not care. But we do care. An the dignity is extremely cold comfort. There is n solution here.

Going a step higher, we say that we shall pas over the affront. We shall utterly ignore the hur which has been done us. So we argue to ourselve in this way: "I know how sincerely I have this per son's friendship. Behind all indifference and crustiness there is still some of the old love; and for the sake of this old love of many years I shall pay no attention to this present inconsistency." I have seen people who were doing that very thing. It is in a way magnanimous. But it is not the highest sort of magnanimity. It has a large section of pride and self-complacency under its fine covering. We must go farther if we would find a real medicine for the sickness.

We come then to the words of Jesus Christ: "If thy brother shall trespass against thee, go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone." There you have love, love both brave and rational. That is common sense all fused with divine courage. Only one who lived as our Master lived could have given such a rule. No one else would have dared.

How many an unhappy period of coldness between old and dear friends that simple rule would end! Think of what must happen in nearly all cases where it is honestly tried. Hear the peacemaker as with shyness he begins his tale: "Dear friend, why have you treated me as if I were no friend? Your behavior has cut me to the quick. I thought our friendship established forever; and these last months that now count into years, you have, as it seems to me, deliberately hurt me." Then will come the broken explanations of surprise, and the peacemaker will go on: "What! You did not know that you had done it? You still care? You thought that I had cast the old friendship aside as outworn? You too have suffered?" Men and women, if any of you have grown cynical as years have increased, if you have caught yourselves saying that there is no such thing on earth as a lasting friendship, if you have passed into friendships and out again, then I beg that you will obey your Master to-day and do what he told you to do. Try the divine experiment of his law and see how it opens the gates and tears down the dikes, and the great wide sea of God's love comes pouring in. So, and so only, are old friendships restored, not only to live again, but to live with such strength as they never knew in the past.

Love's Enemies

Even as I say these words I can imagine that about the lips of one or another might play the incredulous smile of superior experience. "Well," some one might say, "the preacher is theorizing this morning. To be sure, he is repeating one of Christ's rules, but if the preacher were wiser he would doubtless be able to show that this was not intended to be obeyed literally: he would show that it is only an exaggerated Orientalism, put strongly to be picturesque. The preacher does not recognize the humiliation of it all; he does not recognize the risk that I might go up to my old friend with a heart overflowing with love, and I might declare my humility only to receive a blank and frozen stare as if I were a madman or a convict. The preacher does not know what it means to run such an abominable risk as that."

Whether the preacher knows it or not, St. Paul knew it. "Love," he said, "is not puffed up, . . . seeketh not its own." . . . "Love beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." . . . "Love is kind." Love plainly, to this sternly practical man, was no flimsy quality to be picked up by the wayside. It was so precious that he advised men to fight for it: the battle, too, he advised was against a man's most unscrupulous enemy, selfishness, pride, so-called dignity. St. Paul knew exactly what he was talking

LIFT A SONG

LIFT a song from the shadows
As onward you go,
When wild beats the tempest
And skies cease to glow.
Not long is the sunshine
By storms hid away.
'Twill shine through the cloud-rifts
To gladden the day.

Lift a song, let the glad notes
Ring out strong and free.
Let your voice not be silent,
For some one may he Made strong by the message
You bear for your King,
And he'll hush into silence
Your griefs as you sing.

Lift a song, though the heart ache.
He giveth his peace.
He'll heal the deep sorrow,
Nor ever shall cease
The love that doth hold thee.
Then lift to his praise
A song for the mercy
That erowneth thy days.

The First Duty of the Injured

about. He had many frank talks with St. Peter and St. Luke and others. Circumstances were often galling. But the prize of thorough friendship was worth every risk; and that risk he took.

Whether we are old or young, I think it wise to put this plain rule of Christ to the fullest test. Some people do not come to the Holy Communion because they remember the condition, "Be in love and charity with your neighbors," and they remember also that an old friendship was twisted off one day, they know not how, and the memory rankles so sorely that they dare not come. I could wish that some such person this morning could determine to turn about sharply and try Christ's great command.

And do not think yourself alone. I fancy not a man or a woman here has escaped the need of Christ's plain rule for broken friendships. We all need to kneel together and ask of him the supreme gift of his love, whereby we shall never willingly let any friend be cold toward us. As we are ready to give explanations, so we shall as frankly ask them, till all that has been dark and misunderstood is brought to Christ's marvelous light, and in his love the friendship is renewed and made complete.

Life is so great, its destiny so majestic, that to pause in our course over the hindrances that a few candid words could dispel, is pitiful. To find, as one does find, that people are on such strange terms with certain old friends that they run up inconvenient streets rather than meet them, would be ludicrous, were it not so shamefully tragic. People with sound brains and good hearts, who are from forty to ninety years old, have an absurd way of being childish, while they protest that they are only mature and know the world uncommonly well. It is enough to make a really sane man hysterical, because he sees how much true happiness and strong service is being lost. Even the really sane man cannot be self-complacent or patronizing, for he knows how prone even he is to the same sad absurdity when he imagines that he meets what he is pleased to call sufficient provocation. For not one of us is this a foreign problem. We all need to ask God today to keep us childlike and loving and forgiving and very patient.

So let us pray for one another, "O God, give us the true friendship, the true love, which suffereth long and is kind, which is not provoked, which endureth all things."

OUR DEAD

THEY go beyond our reach and call,
We cannot bring them back.
But if they had lived godly lives,
And left a shining track,
We hardly wish them back again
The trials here to face.
We know they're resting safe with God,
In his divine embrace.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, June 8. Genesis 50: 14-21. "Ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good." How tenderly Joseph was leading his brethren back into the full intimacy of unbroken communion! Their consciences were burning with remorse, but he sprinkled them with the dew of forgiveness. Stinging nettles were everywhere, but he found the docks which helped to assuage their pain. He magnified the providence of God who had converted misfortune into good fortune, and he sought to lead his brothers into the full recovered sunshine of God's grace.

"I will nourish you, and your little ones." He paid them back in heavenly coin! Too often it is our delight to pay a man back "in his own coin,"—slight by slight, injury by injury, treachery by treachery, and we wait our turn until we have the unclean money in our hand. But Joseph paid his brothers back in God's money, even with the pure gold of heaven. He was a New Testament saint in Old Testament times; he was a Christian who had never seen Christ.

If we would know it, the only way to conquer our enemies is by the weapon of goodness. Light is ultimately far more efficient than lightning. A prayer is infinitely mightier than a malediction. Sunshine can do what a pickax could never do. Love is the greatest thing in the world.

MONDAY, June 9. Genesis 46: 29-34. How beautiful is a pure and fervent relation between father and son! It is like some favorable port to which boats come, ladened with treasures and spices from every clime. Love brings her manifold riches. Hope brings her golden store. Faith brings her shining confidences. Friendship brings the wealth of secret mines. When father and son are one, in a pure and glorious union, all sorts of strong, angelic visitors come to their dwelling-place, carrying the gifts of joy and peace.

This fair relationship of father and son must be guarded by every ministry of grace. Nothing vulgar must be allowed to stain or imperil it. No discourtesy must be permitted to disturb its bloom. A strong, clean reverence must provide it breath and atmosphere. From the very earliest days the communion of father and son must be nourished in Christ Jesus. It must never be left to take its chance. It must be sanctified, and beautified, and glorified in the Lord. If the Lord appoints and controls the relation he will "give his angels charge" concerning it, and it will grow in strength and beauty with the years. Father and son together discover the secrets of the Lord, and in enriched and enriching communion they dimly reflect the august and holy relation of the Father in heaven and his Son Jesus Christ.

TUESDAY, June 10. Genesis 47: 1-12. Fine character always means ultimate triumph. Duplicity may appear to win in the short run, but in the long run it faints and falls in the way. There is many a racer who is an easy winner in the spurt of a hundred yards, but who utterly fails in the mile. Fidelity wins in the long run! Joseph's uprightness conquered Pharaoh, and he moved in unlimited confidence and regard. "In the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell."

And let me also mark how one man's integrity brings showers of blessing upon others. The whole family shared in the fruits of Joseph's fidelity. For his sake they came into realms of bounty. So it is always. Other people's welfare depends upon our own goodness. If we are disloyal we impoverish their heritage; if we are faithful their inheritance is enriched. If we keep our garden sweet, and clean, and beautiful, others will have the inspiration of our fragrance. If our garden is neglected, and becomes the home of noisome weeds, the ill seed will be wafted to every man's garden on the countryside. "No man liveth to himself."

So let us set about gardening our souls. And, in order that we may be sure of fruits and flowers, let us seek the aid of Him who was once "supposed to be the gardener," and who, in very truth, is the Lord of life and beauty.

WEDNESDAY, June 11. II Corinthians 1: 3-7. "Who comforteth us . . . that we may be able to comfort." And how does the Lord comfort us? He has a thousand different ways, and no one can ever tell by what way the comfort will come to his soul. Sometimes it comes by the door of memory, and sometimes by the door of hope. Sometimes it is borne to us through the ministry of nature, and at other times through the ministry of human speech and kindness. But always, I think, it brings us the sense of a Presence, as though we had a great Friend in the room, and the troubled heart gains quietness and peace. The mist clears a little, and we have a restful assurance of our God.

Now comforted souls are to be comforters. They who have received benefits of grace are to be benefactors. They who have heard the sweet music of God's abiding love are to sing it again to others. They who have seen the glory are to become evangelists. We must not seek to hoard spiritual treasure. As soon as we lock it up we begin to lose it. A mysterious moth and rust take it away. If we do not comfort others our own comfort will turn again to bitterness; the clouds will lower and we shall be imprisoned in the old woe. But the comfort which makes a comforter grows deeper and richer every day.

THURSDAY, June 12. Genesis 49: 28-33. It is beautiful to watch how the soul, at the end of the days, "turns again home." There is a longing for the old haunts, a quenchless desire for old associations and relationships, a sighing for the early simplicities and for the place of our first rest. Strange and pathetic is this call to return, and yet very gracious, too! Life is often a wide and sad vagrancy, and we drift far away from our first moorings, and it is by

JUST A SMILE

SMILE a little, smile a little,
Sing a happy song;
Life is full of thorny places,
And the road seems long.

Smile a little, smile a little,
Make some one feel glad;
Earth is full of stony places,
And some heart is sad.

Smile a little, smile a little,
Life is bright as gold;
Make of earth a glorious heaven,
And be blest threefold.

Smile a little, smile a little,
Be for earth a leaven;
And perhaps you'll give some soul
Just a glimpse of heaven.

Bible Work in the Canal Zone

THE British and Foreign Bible Society recently issued its annual report of work in the Canal Zone and the figures show a gratifying number of whole copies or parts of the Holy Scriptures circulated throughout the territory in the year 1911-1912. At the beginning of the year the following stock was registercd at the depot in the city of Panama: 747 Bibles, 1,481 New Testaments and 5,063 Gospels, a total of 7,291 copies of whole or portions of the Scriptures. From headquarters in London there were received 4,877 Bibles, 2,137 New Testaments, a total of 7,014 books, making the total stock for the year of 14,295 books, the largest ever carried by the Society on the Isthmus of Panama. These books have not lain away on dusty shelves but on the contrary the circulation has been most encouraging—3,986 Bibles, 1,691 New Testaments and 3,251 Gospels, a total of 8,928 books, were sent out from the depot during the year. Of this number, 3,055 were given away and the remainder were sold.

The society has maintained an agent and depot in Panama for two and a half years, and has circulated 13,313 copies of the Scriptures.

The agent employs colporteurs who go out along the line of the Panama Canal, usually following the pay-car through Culebra Cut and at Gatun and Pedro Miguel. The Isthmian Canal Commission employs, besides the white American force of 5,000, a labor force of more than 30,000. This force is composed mainly of negroes imported from the islands of the West Indies, Jamaica, Barbados, and others in the Caribbean Sea. A few natives of Panama and laborers from Central America are employed, and there are also Chinese, Hindus, Japanese, Filipinos and Indians. It is among this population that the Bibles are circulated. The majority of the West Indians owe allegiance to the Anglican Church. A sect called the Christian Mission, which has its headquarters in Bridgetown, Barbados, also has a considerable following. J. M. B.

If You're a Farmer

ON EVENIN'S when the southern breeze comes soft an' sweet an' mild, just clingin' an' caressin' like the fingers of a child, it brings a kind of longin' to a feller's heart to be at peace, an' feelin' full of love t'wards all humanity; it thaws out all the hardness an' the spite he's stored away an' charged 'gainst some that's wronged him, to be used some other day; it makes him mild an' yieldin' so he hardly could refuse a favor to most any one ev'n if he knows he'll lose.

The birds an' beasts are matin' an' the trees an' growin' things are spread with all the soft new life an' beauty summer brings. It all acts like a tonic—lightens up a feller's heart; it brightens up old friendships an' helps new ones get a start; it helps a feller see the works of his Creator's hand; he gets a glimpse of mightiness that men can't understand—that is, if he's a farmer with a real farmer's heart—when the mild, sweet southern breezes of the early summer start.

IS EVANGELISM DYING OUT?

LEADING EVANGELISTS DISCUSS THE QUESTION AND TELL SOME WHOLESOME TRUTHS—SENSATIONALISM AN MONEY-GETTING CONDEMNED, WEAK AND INEFFICIENT METHODS EXPOSED

FOR nearly a year past—indeed, ever since the close of the Men and Religion campaign—the utility of revivals has been a subject of warm and widespread discussion. This controversy is still going on in the pages of the religious press. At no time in our experience has evangelism been under fire all along the line as it is to-day. On every hand we hear it asked: "Is real evangelism disappearing?"; "Does evangelism pay in spiritual results?" and "What has become of the 'lost chord,' the old-time triumphant spiritual note of the evangelist?"

Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman's letter, written from Australia to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in which he advocated a higher standard of evangelism, and severely characterized sensationalism and cupidity in spiritual work, marked a focal point in the controversy. The public interest became acute. As many letters come to us from pastors and laymen, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in order to make a satisfactory presentation of the whole subject, invited the leading evangelists throughout the country to answer—out of their own experience—the question: Is Evangelism Dying Out?"

That the evangelists have responded with right good will is evident from the very large number of replies received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, only a portion of which, however, appear in the present issue. These letters in the main are cheerful concerning the spiritual outlook. They deal with absolute frankness with the questions at issue and endeavor honestly to place blame where it belongs, sparing not even the writers themselves. They should be widely read and appreciated.

Dr. Torrey Touches "The Root of the Matter" as to Loss of Evangelistic Influence

EVANGELISM is not dying out. There seems to be this year a greater demand for evangelism among really intelligent pastors than there has been for many years. It is true that certain types of evangelism are being attacked from various sources; but that is not at all a bad sign. I find that the minister is most likely to be attacked when he is doing real work for God. When the apostles were accomplishing something, then it was that the most violent attacks were being made upon them. When John Wesley began to accomplish something, then opposition of the most energetic and apparently dangerous character arose on every side.

However, I believe that much of our modern evangelism is open to just criticism. That some of our evangelists, even men who in many ways are good and well-meaning, have been snared by the love of money and the love of applause, does not admit of question. Furthermore, there has been, even among leading men, what practically amounts to misrepresentation as to results. There has been such a desire to report large numbers of converts that evangelists have gotten to vying with each other to see who can report the largest numbers and the result has been that all kinds of meaningless invitations have been given out for the sake of getting people up on their feet, or getting them to sign cards, and then all of these people who have stood up or signed cards, many of whom are already the most active members of the church, have been reported as "expressing in some way a decision for Christ." This has led to superficial work, deception, misrepresentation, and consequently to disgust on the part of intelligent pastors.

There can be no doubt also that the Men and Religion campaign wrought great injury for a short time to real, solid evangelism. While this campaign doubtless accomplished good in some cities, it did great harm through the country as a whole. Churches were led to center their activities for the year upon this campaign, which was largely along sociological lines, and as a rule very weak along true evangelistic lines. Of course, the campaign resulted in bitter disappointment to those ministers who really were looking for and expecting something genuine in the way of spiritual results.

But I think the greatest source of evil in modern evangelism is that we have allowed ourselves to be led astray from dependence upon God in prayer and upon the power of his Word preached in the energy of the Holy Spirit, into putting our dependence upon men, machinery, self-exaltation and advertising. Little by little, most of us have drifted into it. Some of us have employed press agents in an altogether worldly way, and this whole thing is an abomination in the sight of God. If God should see fit to chasten us because of it, who of us can wonder? It is questionable if any of us can claim perfect innocence in the matter. What is needed is not some new evangelistic federation, or some new organization; we have too many organizations now, and each new one simply makes matters worse. What we need, as individuals, is to repent and get down on our faces before God and make up our minds that whatsoever others may do we shall endeavor to please God and will not truckle to the spirit of the times, and will not be led away by the love of money, or the love of applause; that we will not try to see if we cannot excel all other evangelists and be "the leading evangelist of the day," or "the acknowledged successor of Mr. Moody."

This old world never needed genuine evangelism more than it needs it to-day, and if we will only pray for one another, instead of trying to excel one another and seek to please God rather than try to get a good report in the papers, and seek to obtain a fresh anointing of the Holy Ghost and go out to spend and be spent in winning men to Christ at any cost to ourselves, financial or in the matter of reputation, then we shall see as great results as we have ever seen in the history of this world. Let us get in line with God. Sometimes, when I think of the petty and selfish ambitions that have crept into my own heart and how I have been tempted to try to get a large compensation for my services in the evangelistic field, I am filled with shame of face and wonder that God ever used me at all.

Why Some Kinds of Evangelism Offend

I WOULD hardly say that evangelism is dying out. There is still a desire, and a very earnest one, in many of the churches for the old-time spiritual note of the evangelist. It cannot, however, be denied that there is a growing prejudice against many of the present-day methods, and rightly so.

Too many are striving for quantity rather than quality, and by so doing they impair the permanency of the work. It is all right to count, but it should be like the counting on the day of Pentecost —only the Spirit-filled. It is easy to count a hundred hands, or even get a hundred names on cards on a single evening, but it is all wrong to herald it abroad as so many converts in the sense of present-time evangelism, and in the end it discredits evangelistic effort. Those whom we would win are ofttimes disgusted with such methods. Recently, while working among the unsaved, we were met with the query: "Where are the seven hundred converts of five years ago?" And it was true that scarcely one could be found.

But neither the evangelist nor his methods are entirely to blame. Much well begun work is allowed to suffer and even die for want of proper nurture by pastor and people. Few realize the great responsibility a church takes upon itself when it receives an influx of new members.

There is a place for evangelism, but it must be the earnest, spiritual kind that grips the soul, and for such there is always a demand; but the sensational, spectacular kind is passing. No, we do not believe that evangelism is dying out. We do believe that almost every pastor, down deep in his heart, is yearning for a revival of spiritual life in his church and will welcome the evangel through whom it will come. C. C. HARPER.

Galesburg, Ill.

Greater Evangelistic Emphasis by the Church Is Needed

I AM too much of an optimist to believe that evangelism will ever die out. There seem to come great spiritual waves at different times, when the evangelistic note receives more special emphasis on the part of the Christian Church, and again there are other seasons when it is not so dominant. At the present time I should feel that it is not receiving the emphasis on the part of the Christian Church that it received a generation ago.

It may be that the evangelistic note is finding expression in other ways than by the evangelist himself. Many an earnest pastor and individual worker is seeking to bring the message of the Gospel to individual hearts, and we should not lose sight of the fact that wherever social service and philanthropy are actuated by a true Christian spirit, it is in a sense evangelism; but in the more restricted sense of the word I do not feel that at the present time the church is laying the emphasis upon the work of the evangelist.

I believe that some of the reasons which have shaken the confidence of many a true and earnest pastor in the cause of evangelistic effort should be considered, and possible mistakes and errors should be corrected. There has never been a time when there has been greater need of an evangelistic emphasis on the part of the church. W. R. MOODY.

"We Need a Panic in Religion," Writes Evangelist Sunday

RESPONDING to your question, "Is Evangelism dying out?" I would say YES, with a certain class of preachers who have never been accused of preaching the fundamentals of religion, i. e., God as the only true God; Jesus Christ as the only begotten Son of God; the Bible as the inspired Word of God, the only rule of faith and practice: salvation by repentance and faith in the atoning blood of Christ; the return of Christ to reign a thousand years; hell, eternal, conscious retribution in a place of torment for the impenitent sinner; heaven, eternal, conscious reward in heaven for the Christian.

The history of the church is the history of revivals. The church is losing its revival spirit because many of the preachers are losing their concern for the lost; they put forth no effort to reach the unsaved with the Gospel.

We hear much about an "ethical revival." You can rot any church in America with dry rot and sink it forty fathoms in hell if you have nothing but this ethical stuff to offer to this old sin-soaked world. When evangelism stops, the church will be simply four walls with a roof over it, and degenerate into a third-rate amusement bureau with religion left out. In the name of God let us tear off the signs that label us "churches of Jesus Christ" if we lose compassion for the unsaved. Every church should be a home of refuge for the discouraged, broken-hearted and sinful who long to be free from the sins that enslave, brutalize, demonize and stupefy.

There has been no general revival because the church has been indifferent, cold, formal, dignified, worldly. This God-hating, Christ-hating, whisky-soaked, gambling-cursed, grafting old world needs Jesus as much to-dny as ever, and yet many a preacher, instead of hurling the anathemas of God into the ranks of sin, high, low, rich, poor, black, white, highbrows and lowbrows, and holding up

THE RESCUE MISSIONS CONVENTION

YOU represent the core of vital Christianity; you stand for the essential message of salvation. You say to the man who is bound captive in the chains of sin as firmly as if they were bands of iron, that because the Son of God has power on earth to-day to impart a new and divine life, there is still hope for him. That is the vital heart of Christian theology and of Christian experience now, and has been for nineteen hundred years. In so far as that has been preached the church has been really Christian, and just in so far as it has not been preached, there has been only an imitation of Christianity. It is this message that keeps rescue missions alive, together with the fact that Christ has always been on hand to deliver the goods and provide samples of his wonder-working resurrection power that can be seen and read of all men. If this had not been so, not only would all the rescue missions have been dead and buried long ago, but the whole Christian Church would have been dead and buried long ago, too."

These were the words of the Rev. Dr. Francis of Boston at one of the meetings of the sixth annual convention of the National Federation of Gospel Missions, held in New York from May 12 to 15. The president of the Federation, Mr. Sidney Whittemore, was chairman of the committee on this convention. Mr. Don O. Shelton and the Rev. A. J. Smith, D.D., were vice-chairmen; Mrs. John H. Wyburn and Mr. Wyburn, secretary and treasurer respectively.

Twenty-six States and Montreal, Canada, were represented at the Conference, and among the delegates were those who represented the following cities: Philadelphia, Pittsburg and Allentown, Pa.; Bridgeport, Conn.; New York City, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Ossining, Herkimer and Solvay, N. Y.; Providence and Pawtucket, R. I.; Boston, Mass.; Minneapolis and Duluth, Minn.; Jersey City, Newark and Morristown, N. J.; Chicago and Joliet, Ill.; Charleston, S. C.; Asheville, N. C.; Norfolk, Va.; Pensacola, Fla.; Dallas, Texas; Baltimore, Md.; Washington, D. C.; Wilmington, Del.; Sioux City and Cedar Rapids, Iowa; Toledo, Ohio; St. Louis, Mo.; Portland, Ore.; and Spokane, Wash.

The term "Gospel Missions" as used in connection with the Federation covers a wide field of evangelistic and philanthropic endeavor, carried on under widely differing circumstances of environment and equipment. One delegate referred to his $50,000 building, with no debt on it, in a city of 35,000, and an endowment of $6,500 from legacies; while another mentioned his preference for a measure of unrest in his congregations in order that the noise made by the rats should not come into too sharp competition with his addresses.

A notable feature was the proportion of the delegates who had had their own lives transformed through the agency of such institutions as they were now conducting themselves. One now holds his meetings in the saloon in which he used to spend his money in the old days, transformed into a place of worship. The assembly might accurately be described as an aggregation of walking and talking up-to-date miracles assembled for the purpose of multiplying indefinitely concrete samples of the transforming power of the living Christ. Incidentally, any one whose circumstances may be exercising a depressing effect upon his faith in the deity of Christ or the power of his resurrection, is recommended to attend a meeting conducted by one of these men. If he stays to the end of the meeting he will see enough to brace up his faith and send him on his way rejoicing.

THE RESCUE MISSION WORKERS AT THE DOORS OF CALVARY BAPTIST CHURCH

In most cases open-air work is one of the most important forms of effort, and on Wednesday three open-air meetings were held at noon, one at Battery Place, one in Printing House Square, and the third in Madison Square, where the delegates from other cities told New Yorkers of all kinds and classes how they could enjoy heaven on the way to heaven.

Among the topics considered at the various meetings were "How to Secure the Confidence and Cooperation of Pastors," "The Wandering Convert," "The Giving of Food and Lodgings in Mission Work," "Summer Evangelization in Tent and Outdoor Meetings," "Industrial Departments" and "Advantages of a Farm to Rescue Missions."

One of the most bizarre contributions was the story of the Rev. Lucius B. Compton of Asheville, N. C., whose work now includes a rescue home for women, an asylum for children, and the maintenance of eleven missionaries among the mountaineers in the Appalachian districts. He was born the bleeding form of Jesus as man's only hope of salvation, is reviewing some fiction, staking out a claim on Jupiter, preaching that man came from a monkey, or "fortuitous concurrence of atoms," or dishing out a fascinating mixture of higher criticism and ethical culture, while this old world is going hellward so fast she is breaking the speed limit.

We need a panic in religion—back to Christ—back to Pentecost—back to apostolic truth—back to the courage of the prophets and of the apostles and our forefathers. The preaching of a compromising, veneered Gospel will never win this world. All this railing against evangelism is simply the trend of the times. A few years ago Christianity was openly assaulted by brazen infidelity; to-day the devil has transformed himself into an angel of light and assaults aggressive Christianity through the damnable heresies and false doctrines which have just enough religion to float the fallacies.

I do not believe that evangelism is dying out any more than I believe that farming is dying out, or that therapeutics, surgery, pedagogy, or merchandising is dying out. In all of these I can see that great changes have taken place in their methods of practice, but they are all more alive to-day than they ever were. The survival of the fittest is a law that is always in force in everything and everywhere. Everybody knows this, and evangelism is no exception. Methods in evangelism changed even during the lifetime of the apostles, but evangelism in its motive and purpose has never changed and never will until God's will is done in this world as it is in heaven.

Who would think of asking, "Is preaching dying out?" because no minister now preaches as John Calvin, Martin Luther, Jonathan Edwards or John Wesley did?

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the drunkard who has been made sober. Ask his wife and children, who have plenty to eat and warm clothes to wear, and whose tears have been dried because daddy has been saved.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the thief who steals no more.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the blasphemer who prays now instead of cursing.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the poor girl who used to sell her virtue in the redlight district, and has left her life of sin and shame and gone back home to mother.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the infidel who used to sneer and rail at God and the church, who now weeps at the cross.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the society woman, who found her chief delight in playing bridge whist and chasing the phantoms of pleasure over the ballroom floor, who now reads her Bible, prays and visits the sick.

Is evangelism dying out? Ask the young man who found himself becoming a cigarette fiend and drifting toward a drunkard's grave, who now, with beaming eyes and shining face, and with elasticity in his step, sings as he journeys on, "I was a sinner but Christ made me whole."

Don't ask some backslidden higher critic, ethical culture, evolution preacher, who preaches salvation by character instead of salvation by repentance and faith in the shed blood of Christ. Don't ask some theological professor, swathed in papyrus and breathing an odor of hieroglyphics, who sneers at the doctrine that "Jesus was conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary." Don't ask some church-member who rents his property for a saloon or a house of ill-fame. Don't ask some stiff, staid, petrified, mildewed, beer-drinking, card-playing church-member who never won a soul to Christ.

Is the sun dying out? Is the moon dying out? Are the stars dying out? Is God's love for sinners dying out? When you can answer yes to all of these questions, then you may write, "Evangelism is dying out."

Evangelism Needs a New Rallying Cry

YOU ask me, "Is evangelism dying out?" My own experience and outlook answer positively, NO! The past two years have been by far the most fruitful of all my evangelistic ministry.

We find it is no harder to win men to Christ to-day than it ever was. If Mr. Finney or Mr. Moody returned to earth now, they would find evangelism a far different proposition from that of past years. Amidst the multitudinous distractions of theaters, picture shows, athletics, social functions, and financial and industrial pressure which are speeding our civilization to the utmost, it is becoming constantly harder to get people to think upon the great themes of the spiritual and eternal. To accomplish results evangelism must to-day be carried forward on a scale commensurate with other lines of modern activity.

If there has been a dearth of evangelistic demand in some quarters, it can be attributed primarily to the general decadence of vital Christianity. Only its effects can be discerned more plainly in evangelism than in other forms of religious work. For example: The scarcity of fruit on a fruit tree is much more noticeable than would be the lack of increase in the size of the trunk or the growth of the bough. Second: This dearth is due largely to the materialistic and questioning spirit of our age. Third: It may also reasonably be charged to some notorious examples of "shirt-sleeved" evangelism which have frequently tended to cheapen the profession and bring all evangelists into disrepute. Fourth: To an over-dependence upon nurture to the neglect of evangelism.

But the most important question is: "How can evangelism be improved?" First: The plan you suggest of a federated, interdenominational committee of evangelism might be of advantage. If this could be brought about by the church bodies themselves rather than by self-appointed leaders it would carry far greater confidence. Such a committee ought to include three classes, laymen, pastors and evangelists. Second: Instruction on evangelism in theological seminaries by competent and experienced evangelists. Third: Elimination of objectionable features from modern evangelism. Fourth: The weeding out of incompetents and the recruiting of consecrated and cultured leaders. Especially enlisting men for evangelists who have had a preparation as pastors and from experience understand better the needs of the church. Fifth: Modern evangelism needs the incentive of a mighty central

The Matter With Evangelism

EVER since apostolic days, the evangelist has been a spiritual torch in the service of the Christian Church. Gifted far above the average man, and with hearts fired with the "passion for souls," these devoted workers have been of priceless value in rekindling the spiritual ardor of the churches, strengthening their numbers, and reaching many who could not be dealt with by the regular organizations. To-day, there is a note of discord in the evangelistic camp. Pastors and workers are not in full accord as they should be. Methods have been used which have raised the question whether commercialism ought to have so prominent a place in revival work. When Dr. Chapman wrote from Australia to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, he voiced in plain terms the general feeling in the church to-day concerning evangelism, and warned the workers that the methods now in use were in many cases viewed with disapprobation by both clergy and laity. He believed the time had come for a higher standard of evangelistic work and urged his fellow laborers to prepare for such a contingency. In this sound advice he was supplemented by Dr. Biederwolf, who favored the organization of an Evangelistic Federation.

Now, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, which believes in evangelism, has laid the situation before the evangelists of the country, with the request for a frank and unrestrained expression of their views. We publish to-day the first instalment of the answers received in response to our invitation. It is a wholesome discussion, and one which has a very special interest to pastors and church members. Our correspondents write like men in dead earnest, and do not hesitate to apply criticism where they deem it to be deserved. We have requested Dr. Biederwolf to sum up at the close of the discussion, and Dr. Chapman may also have something more to say on the subject. Let us hope that it may clear the atmosphere somewhat and lead to greater harmony and better spiritual results.

Church and State

IN a recent article in the Belfast News-Letter, which is reprinted in the Protestant Observer of London in its issue of August, 1912, the writer, Arthur Walsh, discusses the chief objections to Home Rule held by the Irish Protestants. Their principal apprehension he declares to be the influence in Irish politics of the Church of Rome itself. As evidence that this fear is well founded he points to the doctrines taught to the priest-students in Maynooth College (a Roman institution), which is set forth in their class-books in language that admits of no misinterpretation. Baptized Protestants in Ireland are declared to be subject to the laws of the Roman Church and to the penalties they impose. This same principle was set forth in the letter of Pius IX, August 7, 1873, to the German Emperor in these words:

> Every one who has been baptized belongs, in some way or other—which to define more precisely would be out of place here—belongs, I say, to the Pope.

Further, Professor E. J. O'Reilly, of the Theological branch at Maynooth College, in his Relations of the Church to Society (p. 77), reiterates this claim:

> A Protestant clergyman or a Protestant layman introduces the child whom he validly baptizes, as effectually into the Catholic Church as the Pope could, and into no other.

In a country where the government is Catholic, such laws and the penalties they carry can be and are enforced. Church domination and its results have been sufficiently demonstrated in the history of those lands that have come under Roman rule. But Rome claims more than merely spiritual supremacy wherever she can safely assert her demands.

Naturally, the question will be asked: "What if those who are not affiliated with Rome should repudiate these claims of supreme authority over the State?" Rome has provided for such emergencies and is prepared, wherever she has the political power, to compel obedience or to apply "all the necessary machinery for the enforcement of her laws against Protestant 'heretics'." It is her proud claim, Mr. Walsh reminds us, that she is unchangeable—"the same yesterday, to-day and forever."

There are several class-books in use at Maynooth College which instruct the priest-students how to deal with Protestant religionists. One of these, based on the teachings of Thomas Aquinas, is truly medieval in the ferocity of its suggestions as to the punishment of heretics. Another text-book, Schouppe's Course of Religious Instruction for the Use of Colleges and Schools (approved by the Archbishop of Westminster) says (p. 72) that > Absolute civil tolerance is bad and unjust. . . . A legislator is bound to protect the true religion, just as much as he is bound to protect order and repress disorder. . . . Can we then establish in principle the separation, or we may say the divorce, of the church from the state? This assertion, so justly condemned by the church, is contrary alike to divine and natural right. . . . In a country where there are many religions, but where the Catholic religion predominates, it must be the favored one. False worships may be tolerated so long as they remain inoffensive.

This is equivalent to saying that active antagonism, though lawful and right from the view of such "moral" teaching, is not always expedient. Professor O'Reilly deals with the same subject in his text-book already referred to, and goes a step further than his associate instructors in recognizing the point of expediency. He says (on page 269 of The Relations of the Church to Society):

> "It is our interest to take our stand on the broad principle of liberty of conscience for all, on the doctrine that differences of religion are not to be minded by governments, that they are to be settled with God, not with man." I freely admit that this doctrine is convenient for Catholics who have to do with Protestant governments. The principle of liberty of conscience, unbounded liberty of conscience, once admitted, is a strong shield and a powerful weapon against oppression of Catholics. The unexclusiveness of the principle commends it to many an adversary of our faith. Hence it is that Catholics have been led to proclaim it, emphasize it, and extol it in the most eloquent terms. I do not mean to imply that the Catholics I allude to consciously put forward a false theory for a purpose. . . . The convenience of the ultra-tolerant theory we have been considering commends it to those circumstanced as Catholics are in these countries, and helps to make many of them believe it; while on the other hand, they are disposed to look on an opposite view as not only incorrect but dangerous. But, for all that, the principle is not true, and we must not sacrifice truth for convenience, not even to what may seem to be the public good. The principle is one which is not, and never has been, and never will be approved by the Church of Christ.

Here we must leave the subject, trusting to the intelligent American reader, whatsoever his faith, to digest these matters at leisure and form his own conclusions. These quotations from Catholic text-books of to-day are strictly in line with the ancient teachings of the Church of Rome. Here we have its true political attitude defined by its own chosen exponents and not by its enemies. Here also we find the same Jesuitical spirit of bowing before expediency which Rome has invariably adopted when dealing with conditions unfavorable to the fullest exercise of her doctrines of universal supremacy and the subordination of the state to the ecclesiastical power. We cannot believe that her hopes can ever come to fruition in a land whose people are steadily growing in intelligence and in the love of liberty and of that wide toleration which assures all absolute freedom in matters of creed and conscience.

The "Soft Pedal" in Diplomacy

WITH the exchange of notes between the Washington and Tokyo Governments, the California Japanese question has assumed a more favorable turn and may now fairly be regarded as pointing to a better understanding in the near future. Japan has been impressed with the candor of the American reply, which, so far as can be learned, presented the real feelings of this country, its appreciation of Japanese character and progress, and our national sense of the consideration due to a people with whom our relations have always been friendly and satisfactory. Now that diplomacy has opened a clear path to the adjustment of matters, it is to be hoped that no undue exhibition of sensational jingoism in either country will occur to cause new complications. While the "soft pedal" is being applied by the diplomats in the two capitals in an earnest effort to reach an understanding, it is a good time for our legislators, State and national, to put an embargo on "jingo speeches." We propose to treat with Japan through sane and honorable methods, respecting both her rights and our own, and keeping in view our mutual treaty obligations. Any act that would wound the self-respect of the Japanese would be unworthy of this nation, and any orator who burns to make personal capital out of the situation by firing a platform broadside, should be muzzled and led to the rear. It is a time for sound common sense and not for sensationalism and clamor.

Greeting the Unseen With a Cheer

MR. B. SANDERS WALKER, a young banker of Macon, Ga., seems to have established a new record for cheerful dying. On Wednesday, May 14, he took by mistake a seven-grain tablet of bichloride of mercury, thinking it was a headache tablet. He did not discover his mistake for four hours; and by the time the doctors arrived they declared the poison to be so intrenched in his system that recovery was impossible. They informed the patient, and he set about his brave task of meeting death cheerfully. He was not compelled to remain in bed, but dressed, and received friends who came to call. He settled his business affairs and made his will; the house was made bright with flowers and he greeted his friends with his customary cheerfulness. The whole city was stirred by his cheerful courage, and all over the country men and women were interested in the spectacle of a brave man who could, as Browning put it, "Greet the unseen with a cheer."

Some one asked John Wesley on a certain day what he should do if he knew that he was to die the next night. He had the appointments for the day's work clearly in mind and replied without hesitation that he would preach at such a place at such an hour, preach again at another place, meet a class here, and so on through to the end of the day's work. "Then," he continued, "I should go to bed and wake up in heaven."

After all, that is the only sensible way to live. Every one of us is under sentence of death as surely as the gentleman who unwittingly took that fatal draught the other day. Are we living so that we can face death and the world beyond with calmness and a smile? Are we living so that if this day were the last there would be nothing in it to make us ashamed?

The Christian has nothing to fear. His faith rests on things that cannot be shaken. His hope in the brightness beyond is clear and strong. His work lies plainly to hand. Courage is in his soul and laughter upon his lips. Familiar hands stretch out toward him from the unseen shore. He knows that there he shall see face to face the Captain of his salvation. He works steadily, sturdily doing with his might what his hands find to do. He is working under orders, awaiting the command that shall take him to another field of service. Whenever the summons comes he is ready to greet the unseen with a cheer, while friends bid him

> "Strive and thrive!" cry "Speed, fight on, fare ever
> There as here!"

Valuable Battleship Plans Stolen

THE United States Navy Department is much concerned about the theft of duplicate sets of plans of battle fire control apparatus to be installed on the super-dreadnought Pennsylvania. The matter was of so deep and general an interest that Secretary Daniels gave out the following statement: "On the night of March 4, when there was a large number of persons in the State, War and Navy Building, assembled to witness the inauguration fireworks, there were taken, by persons as yet unknown, from the drafting-room of the Bureau of Steam Engineering uncompleted plans of the electric wiring of the new battleship Pennsylvania. These plans showed the general arrangement of the decks, hatches, etc. A short time after similar plans were missed from the same drafting-room." Detectives have been busy looking for the thief, who has not yet been discovered. The knowledge given by these plans in the hands of experts would be of untold damage to the vessel in an engagement. Marksmen of the enemy would be able quickly to direct a shot that would disable the ship and make it impossible to direct her fire. The apparatus consists of tall skeleton structures fore and aft looking like oil derricks. These are the fire control masts. In their tops, during a naval engagement, officers are stationed, who send signals to all the batteries as to how to direct their fire at the enemy. It is from these tops the wires run that are shown in the plans stolen. Such a theft is punishable by a fine of $1,000 or by a year's imprisonment or both. The giving of them to any foreign government would be punishable by an imprisonment of not more than ten years. It is likely the plans were taken by some spy and are in the hands of some power interested in knowing our naval secrets. If the thief be a foreigner his deed would be despicable enough; if a citizen of this country his treachery would be base beyond words to describe. The thief, whoever he be, is one of the great army who has broken the commandment:

Thou shalt not steal. (Ex. 20:15.)

A Record Family

THOMAS ALLISON of Newton County, Ark., comes pretty close to the record in the number of his descendants. He is 93 years old, was married three times, and has 262 descendants in all. He is the father of 50 children, grandfather of 125 children, great-grandfather of 60 children, and great-great-grandfather of 27 children. His oldest child is sixty-five, and his youngest is eleven years of age. The parents are incarnated in the features, character and activity of the children; what arithmetic can compute the influence of this man nearing the century mark on his 262 descendants, and those that shall be born to them? How important that there be the proper parental example and instruction! There is such a continuous line of hearses to the cities of the dead that cradles, and many of them, too, are necessary to keep the balance of population on the proper side. While families like Mr. Allison's must be the rare exception, the fact remains that reasonably large families among the poor as well as rich are a blessing to the church and the state. Jehovah manifested his appreciation of the value of children in the establishment of a nation when he took its founder out under the open sky at night and said:

Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them; and he said unto him, So shall thy seed be. (Gen. 15: 5.)

Sacrifices Life for Child

HAGAN SHINE, Whitestone, L. I., gave a quart of his blood by transfusion to save his child's life a short time ago, but the little one did not rally and the other day Mr. Shine died as a result of his loss of blood. It was a pity that the operation was not successful, and that they both had to die when such beautiful heroism was manifested by the man. He may not have occupied an important place in society, nor had any notice in the newspapers, nor figured as a man of influence and importance, but the story of his heroism is beautiful. We have in his action, however, the tale of the devotion of the average American to his children. There is scarcely a day that does not chronicle the risk or the sacrifice of the life of a father or mother in efforts to save the children. Undying as is the affection of parents for children, the love of our heavenly Father for us, his children, is still greater. The prophet expresses the superiority of the divine love.

Yea, they may forget, yet will I not forget thee. (Isa. 49: 15.)

Greatest Efficiency at Sixty

IN AN address in Washington the other day Dr. Harvey W. Wiley, former Pure Food Commissioner, said that men and women sixty years old and over are the real benefactors and the actual workers for the uplift of the human race. He said: "The idea that the greatest services to humanity are rendered by young men and women is shown by the facts to be erroneous. These services are rendered by elderly men and women. We do not reach the maximum of efficiency until the age of sixty." It is encouraging to hear such clever talk about old people by such a reliable authority as Professor Wiley. Professor Osler expressed exactly the opposite opinion about old people; he thought that people of sixty had far outlived their usefulness and were fit only for translation. It is likely that if the views of Drs. Wiley and Osler were added together and divided by two, the average would come pretty close to the truth of the matter. It is certain that this cold utilitarian age, measuring a man as a machine capable of making so much money, does not have the appreciation of the efficiency of old people that Dr. Wiley does. It is next to impossible for a man of three score years to get a job at any trade or kind of employment which has in it a decent living. And even in the ministry when experience has ripened the man in character and service and sweetened his spirit, it is counted almost an impertinence for him to expect a call to any large or so-called important pastorate. Why should he expect to have anything when he has crossed the dead-line at fifty and gotten past it ten years dodging the bullets that fly in that territory? Some ought to have retired before they were gray for lack of ability or consecration, but sixty years do not hurt but help the lawyer and doctor and merchant who have prospered, and they do not hurt the average preacher, as the church is inclined pretty nearly universally to believe. There is a place for young men and old men in the callings and professions of life, and that institution in the industrial or religious realm that does not utilize in wisdom and fairness the efficiency of each is far from complete. Cicero in his essay on old age defines the harmonious relationship between the service of youth and age in the labors of life by the figure of the navigation of the ship in which the young men climb the masts and adjust the sails, while the old men sit at the helm and steer the vessel. It was this wisdom which experience gives to age that Rehoboam sought in his conference with his old men, which he unluckily abandoned for the rash advice of the young men of his realm.

And the king answered the people roughly, and forsook the old men's counsel that they gave him. (I Kings 12: 13.)

Fortune in Ashcarts

THE Street Cleaning Department of New York has just been assisting in a thorough spring cleaning of the city. Fifteen thousand loads of ashes, rubbish and garbage were removed one day, and another day fourteen thousand loads were collected and hauled away. There are two men who have been especially delighted with this thorough cleaning—Antonio De Marco and Joe Morone. They are what are called the official "scow-trimmers" of the city. The more old bottles and tumble-down beds, rickety furniture and scrap iron the city cleaning department carries to the dumps, the richer they grow. So profitable is this scow trimming that for many years Antonio De Marco paid the city the enormous sum of $91,000 a year for the privilege of sorting out the good from the bad refuse. Under competition the weekly payments have been cut down, but the privilege still is worth considerable more than a thousand dollars a week. This is in ordinary times, but the house-cleaning period has been a great harvest for the "trimmers." The utilization of waste forces in the realm of matter is one of the most interesting features of modern industry and life. In many great institutions it is claimed that the waste furnishes the profit. There is such great need of utilization of the waste forces in the intellectual and moral world, the idle moments, the drowsy faculties and the unemployed opportunities. These men who pay many thousands of dollars a year for the privilege of sorting the refuse, suggest that economy which the Saviour enjoined in his words:

Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost. (John 6: 12.)

Banker Unfortunate But Honest

THE Security Savings Trust Company of Kansas City, Mo., failed in the panic of 1893. Mr. Willard P. Holmes, who was at the head of his bank, and his wife set themselves at once to earn money enough to pay off the $63,000 which the bank owed. The other day they paid the last dollar of the amount and cleared up every cent of indebtedness. Mr. Holmes said: "It was a matter of plain duty. I was instrumental in organizing the institution. I got some good people in it with me. Their friends deposited money with us. My wife and I determined that we would never rest easy or cease our efforts until every penny of the indebtedness of the bank was paid. We have a feeling of infinite relief now." What a splendid example this man has set of old-fashioned incorruptible integrity, and what a beautiful spirit his loyal wife had, who, by sacrifices and the patient hard toil of twenty years, aided him in meeting their just obligations. There are crises that seem to make restitution impossible, and yet there must be the honest endeavor to do so if there shall be peace of conscience or integrity of character. The action of this man reveals the quality which is attributed to Stephen.

Provide things honest in the sight of all men. (Rom. 12: 17.)

HOW ONE GIRL HELPED HER CHURCH

THIS is the plain story of how one girl, an ardent young Sunday school teacher, helped to reduce the building indebtedness of her church, and how she hopes ultimately to efface that indebtedness altogether. Her method was so practical and withal so simple that it might well be followed by members of other churches. The girl's name is Elsie J. Phillippi, and the church, the First United Brethren Church of Johnstown, Pa.

In the first place, the congregation of the First United Brethren Church had outgrown its building. The original church, little more than a meeting-house, was built in 1844. This was replaced by a stone church, built in 1868, but the growth of the United Brethren in Johnstown had been so rapid that it became necessary recently to build a larger, more commodious edifice. The Building Committee worked faithfully and manfully, raising money by such devices and collections as seemed proper, with the result that on Sunday, November 24, 1912, the new church, a picture of which appears on this page, was dedicated.

The Building Committee received many pledges of financial help from nearly all of the congregation, but, as frequently happens in such cases, some of the congregation were unable to make good their pledges when called upon to do so. Naturally, every adjunct of the church was called upon to help. And the pastor, in particular, asked the Sunday school classes to help make up the deficiency. At once a species of rivalry was started between the various classes, each of which strove to turn in the largest amount by the end of the ensuing month. Miss Phillippi taught one of these classes—twenty-three boys, ranging in age from ten to fourteen.

MISS ELSIE J. PHILLIPPI

Now, Miss Phillippi is one of the most successful class teachers of the school. She has a manner with the boys—which is another way of saying that she understands them. Of course the boys think they understand her, and probably they do, for it is her theory that boys will be boys, even in Sunday school. At any rate, she and her Sunday school class work together on a basis of mutual confidence that has had some surprising results. She began immediately to urge them to lend every effort to turn in more money at the end of the month than any other class in the school. She went deliberately to work with each boy to find out some little pleasure or luxury which he might be willing to do without and which would consequently result in his turning in more money than usual for the benefit of the building fund. They worked together to such good purpose that at the end of the month they contributed "over four dollars." True, other classes had gathered together as much or nearly as much as this, so Miss Phillippi and her boys made mutual pledges for extra effort to save at least eight dollars during the next month.

Now, one of the boys in her class was Charles Huffman. His brother Percy was a CHRISTIAN HERALD boy who sold copies of the paper in Johnstown. Percy's mother, Mrs. Huffman, had heard of the efforts of the Sunday school class to raise money for the building fund, and suggested to Miss Phillippi that she might very much enlarge the sum total of her Sunday school class offerings by selling CHRISTIAN HERALDS. Percy Huffman had even won a prize of $100 from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in a sales contest. Why could not Elsie Phillippi, who was older and more experienced, sell many more copies and make much more money?

THE FIRST UNITED BRETHREN CHURCH AND PARSONAGE OF JOHNSTOWN, PA.

About this time THE CHRISTIAN HERALD offered to its boy agents a prize for the greatest number of subscriptions or single copies sold by any one agent within a given time. Every single copy sold was to count one point in favor of each boy contestant, and every yearly subscription taken was to count fifty-two points in favor of each contestant. The boy or girl with the greatest number of points would naturally win the prize. In addition to this, of course, each boy or girl salesman would receive the regular commission for the sale of CHRISTIAN HERALDS.

Elsie Phillippi wrote to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for information. Her idea was to organize her class and try and have the boys induce all of the church members to subscribe. She found, however, that according to the terms of the contest, this was not permissible—that is to say, she might take as many subscriptions as she could personally, and sell as many copies as she could personally, but it would not be fair to other contestants to employ a number of boys to take subscriptions or sell copies for her. There was no objection to having the boys deliver the copies, but she must make the actual sale.

Nothing daunted, she started in. She obtained a list of the church members; indeed, she knew them all personally, and made the rounds of their homes, explaining the nature of the publication, telling them just why she wished to sell it, or why she wished them to subscribe. Every cent she made in commission was to be turned over to the Building Committee, and if—this was a big IF—she could manage to win a prize, she would turn the full amount of that also over to the Building Committee. Of course the church members were naturally in sympathy with her plan. She had very little trouble in obtaining subscriptions or in selling single copies. Those who did not agree to subscribe for a whole year were, in most cases, perfectly willing to buy single copies. She worked early and late, excepting Sundays.

It became a matter of comment in town if Miss Phillippi was seen without a bundle of CHRISTIAN HERALDS under her arm. To her the enterprise was not commercial. She was helping her church, and so she had no hesitancy in asking people to buy her paper. Again she felt she was giving them full value for the money. She was not asking them to make a contribution. Those who subscribed received the paper for a whole year, fifty-two fine numbers. Those who bought single copies received their money's worth to that extent.

When her regular weekly customers became numerous enough she organized her Sunday school class to make deliveries, so that the paper might reach her customers on time, but the collection of the money she attended to herself. Miss Phillippi has the executive mind, and finally it became obvious to her that, handicapped with the necessity of making every sale on her own account the number of CHRISTIAN HERALDS sold by her must necessarily be limited to the number of people she could see and talk with in a given time. How to get over this difficulty was the problem. She solved it one Saturday evening while walking down the main street of Johnstown. One of the finest general stores in town was owned by a friend. She noticed that Saturday evening was the busiest in that store; that more people seemed to be passing in and out of it than in any other store in the neighborhood. The idea came to her to take advantage of the crowd. She consulted the proprietor of the store, told him what she was trying to do, and asked his permission to place a table just inside the entrance of the store.

If it had been a personal matter, it is probable that he would not have consented, but when he found it was a matter of helping the church he not only consented, but urged her to do it. So the following Saturday night found Miss Phillippi ensconced behind a table piled high with CHRISTIAN HERALDS. Every one who entered or left that store was made to know what those CHRISTIAN HERALDS were there for. She sold more this way than she had been able to in the same length of time anywhere else. Later on she did the same thing in a woman's furnishing store, which was owned by another friend. In fact, she worked different nights in different stores, according as the size of the crowd suggested. Then it happened that several entertainments or sociables were given by her church. Miss Phillippi and her tables were to be seen at the entrance of these also. She even obtained permission to sell CHRISTIAN HERALDS at the sociables of a church of another denomination in Johnstown.

Now, as is natural to surmise, the amount of money collected by Miss Phillippi was growing with the weeks. But while she took her class into her confidence, she at the same time made it a great secret between the boys and herself as to just how well she was doing. In fact, the amount grew perceptibly, and she and the class began to have visions of a CHRISTIAN HERALD prize in addition to the commissions which she was earning. But the Building Committee did not know it. No! the joy of letting them know just how much was coming to them was reserved so that the Sunday school class might tell them about it suddenly as a great surprise. Of course, other classes were working hard along other lines, and some very creditable collections were made, but it was not to be expected that they would be able to collect as much as Miss Phillippi and her boys.

By the end of December she had a record of 880 points; by the end of January she had 3,147 points; by the end of February, 4,650 points; by the end of March, 6,221 points. This meant that she had sold 1,520 single copies of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and secured 70 yearly subscriptions, 22 six months' subscriptions, and 35 three months' subscriptions. Quite a record for such a short time. The prize contest ended March 31, and while she knew that she had gone far toward winning the first prize, she could not know, of course, what the boys and girls in other parts of the country had been doing. When the contest was over, she had turned over to the Building Committee $120 in commissions from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and in collections which her boys were able to make in other ways. This was announced to the Sunday school about the end of March.

The final reward came a little later in the form of a letter to Miss Phillippi from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, informing her that she had won the first prize and was entitled to $125 in cash. Again was an announcement made to the Sunday school, and the check was turned over to the Building Committee. She and her boys had earned and collected a total of $245. She was complimented upon her success everywhere, and even the local newspapers contained an account of her achievement.

This is the story, which only goes to show what it was possible for one girl to do for her church; indeed, what it is possible for any girl to do for her church if the will is there and a way can be devised. Elsie Phillippi had the will and she certainly devised a way. And it is characteristic of her that she does not mean to stop with this achievement. Having gone so far, she desires to go further. She believes that, working without any contest, and able, therefore, to use the services of her Sunday school class, she can take a greater number of subscriptions for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD than she was enabled to do under the terms of the contest. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, at least, is willing to help her accomplish her ultimate ambition—to clear the church entirely of debt—by contributing a generous share of every new subscription which she and her friends in the church will send in, provided the money so donated is used entirely for church purposes.

And this offer is open to members of any church who desire to take advantage of it, and it provides a greater chance to make revenue for churches than was enjoyed even by Miss Phillippi.

GRAND OLD AGE*

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

JACOB was the Grand Old Man of his time. We read in the Bible that the angel said to him: "As a prince hast thou power with God and with men" (Gen. 32: 28). Jacob's greatness, however, was not dependent upon his possessions, for when the greatest earthly honor was bestowed upon him—his presentation to the great Pharaoh of Egypt—he was a wayfarer, and would have been in a starving condition but for the generosity of Pharaoh. We see him now at one hundred and thirty years of age, brought by his son Joseph, the ruler of Egypt, to be "received at court." Does he bow low before the king to receive his blessing? Not so; instead he raises himself to his full height, and gives a very brief history of his life, as if that could interest Pharaoh. But it did! And then he raises his hand and blesses Pharaoh! Did the old man's blessing offend the great monarch of Egypt? Far from it, for in accordance with the king's wishes Joseph gave Jacob and his sons possessions in the best of Egypt, the richest pasture land. And the great Pharaoh instructed Joseph to give his father and his father's sons and their families plenty of food during the years of famine.

Was it the grand old age of Jacob that appealed to Pharaoh, or was it the regard he had for his most efficient secretary of agriculture, Joseph? It is not probable that Jacob could have gained an audience with Pharaoh at all if he had not been the father of Joseph. But undoubtedly the heroic in Jacob impressed Pharaoh and moved him to honor the patriarch and treat him with great liberality. At that interview Jacob wore a more honorable crown than Pharaoh himself: it was "the hoary head found in the way of righteousness." The hoary head found in the way of unrighteousness is no crown at all, far from it, for it only serves to make the wearer more despised.

JOSEPH PRESENTING JACOB TO PHARAOH
From the painting by Sir E. J. Poynter, Bart. P.R.A.

Let us ask the question, How did Joseph feel about taking his father into the presence of Pharaoh? There was probably a great contrast in the clothing worn by Jacob and Joseph. Joseph was arrayed in vestures of fine linen, which was like woven air, and he wore a gold chain, which the king had placed upon his neck, and also the king's ring was upon his finger as a sign of authority (Gen. 41: 42). Was Joseph ashamed of his father, or proud of him that day? From the frank manner that Joseph went in and told Pharaoh, "My father and my brethren, and their flocks and their herds and all that they have, are come," we must believe that Joseph had only joy in presenting his father to Pharaoh.

The kind treatment which Jacob received from his son Joseph put an extension of seventeen years upon his life; he was one hundred and thirty when he was presented to Pharaoh, and one hundred and forty-seven when he died.

I saw a tent beside the lotus-river;
I saw an old man bowed upon the bed;
Methought the river sang, "I roll forever;
But soon he will be dead.

"Long since his grandsire walked beside my stream;
His wife, a lily, lit my lilied meadows;
Long since they glided like a magic dream
Into the old-world shadows.

"Up where the grandsire rests the mummy goes—
Up to the shriveled lily's mask of clay;
But on my liquid music grandly flows,
And it shall flow for aye."

Whereto another voice kept chanting on:
"The shadows come, the shadows go, old river;
But when thy music shall be mute and gone,
He shall sing psalms forever."

And then, methought, beside that pastoral tent
The ladder rose from the green land below;
Fair, spiritual creatures made descent
And beckoned him to go. —Unidentified.

But Jacob as a grand old man was not a perfect man in his youth, particularly he had his failings: deceit and selfishness, as when he obtained his brother's birthright, and when he took an unfair course to increase his flocks; but he had outgrown or overcome those wicked ways. Quite likely the twenty years that he had mourned for Joseph were the crucible in which he had been purified.

"Father," said a Persian monarch to an old man who, according to Oriental usage, bowed before the sovereign's throne, "pray be seated. I cannot receive homage from one bent with years, and whose head is white with the frosts of age." The old man sat down. "And now, father," said the monarch, "tell me thine age. How many of the sun's revolutions hast thou counted?" "Sire," answered the old man, "I am but four years old." "What!" interrupted the king, fearest thou not to answer me falsely, or dost thou jest on the very brink of the tomb?" "I speak not falsely," replied the aged man, neither would I offer a foolish jest on a subject so solemn. Eighty long years have I wasted in folly and sinful pleasures and in amassing wealth, none of which I can take with me when I leave this world. Four years only have I spent in doing good to my fellow men; and shall I count these years that have been utterly wasted? Are they not worse than a blank, and is not that portion only worthy to be reckoned as a part of my life which has truly answered life's best end?"

Do not give up easily, and say, "Oh, let the young folks do that." Henry Ward Beecher once said: "Do not be

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—HERE IS A SUNDAY SCHOOL victory won single-handed that may well prove an inspiration. In the winning school at Atlanta, Ga., the gain was sixfold, but here is the story of a girl of fifteen who quietly brought in seventy-five, all by herself. We recall the Bible challenge: "Shall not one chase a thousand?" in our joy over this "victory of an army of one." We quote the following story: "Ella Nesbitt, a pupil in Richardson Memorial Sunday School, Philadelphia, was recently given a gold watch for her genius in adding members to the Sunday school. During the last few months she has brought in seventy-five boys and girls, increasing the attendance 15 per cent. Miss Nesbitt modestly denies that she has done anything wonderful. 'I simply heard the pastor talk about how nice it would be to have a larger Sunday school, so I thought I might as well try to get the children in,' she said. 'So I asked every boy and girl I saw in the street in the neighborhood if they didn't want to join. Lots of them did, and four of them came the first Sunday. After that they came ten and fifteen at a time.'"

—HAVING GATHERED YOUNG people in Sunday school, the officers and teachers must study how to keep them and convert and develop them. Youth needs to be given (1) something worth hearing; (2) something to see; (3) something to do, in the class and through the week. No teacher has any right to come to a class merely to read extracts from a printed lesson or to say such commonplaces as occur to the mind without study. It is a downright insult to a class and to God when a teacher first looks at her lesson on Sunday morning after a late breakfast with only a few minutes to prepare for molding character for life and forever. The teacher should read the lesson a whole week ahead and "watch out" all the week for illustrations and applications. But the teacher should also remember that in this age of moving pictures and illustrated magazines the eyes should also be enlisted by charts, diagrams, object lessons, blackboard or slate outlines, which need not be artistic—a long upright line may stand for a mother, a short one for her boy, a square for the city at hand and another long line for the approaching prophet. But a class will be still more attentive and more impressed if not only ears and eyes, but hands are occupied—the latter copying diagrams or statements on slates or pads or note-books.

Each organized class, and that should be every class in which the scholars are twelve years of age or over, should meet at least once a month for practice in holding meetings for social fellowship and to plan for useful work such as Boy Scouts do, whose plans should be studied by teachers of boys. This is our answer to a teacher in Missouri whose class is made up of first and second year high school students who asks for "something which will add interest to our mid-week meetings, and make a real live, energetic class, meeting the needs, so far as possible, of every boy in it." We shall be glad if some teachers who have had good success in these out-of-school meetings of Sunday school classes, whether of boys or girls, will promptly tell others through the Round Table how they do it.

—IS YOUR CITY or town or district going to have a Sunday school parade or pageant or big picnic this season? If it is, send the best picture you can get of the event to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We will print a number of the best ones, and best in this case is not necessarily the largest. Those exhibiting novel features of a kind likely to prove of benefit if introduced elsewhere will receive first consideration.

Strawberry short-cake, better than ever. More economical too!

Strawberry Short Cake made even more delicious, much more digestible, and at less expense. And just at present strawberries are apt to be better for short cake than for serving by themselves.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening For Cake Making

There are three reasons for using Crisco for short cake, and in your other baking as well.

It makes a more delicious cake, as rich as if made with butter. It is delightfully tender.

It is better for you, for Crisco digests with readiness, while lard does not.

It costs less, for Crisco costs half as much as butter, and requires no refrigeration to keep it pure and fresh.

Try this recipe. It is simply a sweet biscuit dough, made richer and more digestible by Crisco:

2 cupfuls flour	2 teaspoonfuls sugar
4 teaspoonfuls baking powder	¾ cupful milk
½ teaspoonful salt	¼ cupful Crisco

(Use level measurements)

Mix dry ingredients, work in Crisco with tips of fingers, and add milk gradually. Toss on floured board and divide in two parts for top and bottom. Pat, roll out and spread both with Crisco to obtain crust and to keep the two from sticking. Place one on top of the other and bake twelve minutes in a hot oven, in a round layer cake tin. Separate and spread with crushed strawberries that have been sweetened to taste.

Attractive Cook Book, Free

This dainty little volume tells more about cakes, pastry, and all cooking. Contains 100 carefully tested recipes and some interesting facts about Crisco. Address The Procter & Gamble Co., Dept. S, Cincinnati.

DAILY MEDITATION

the mercy of God that we come back to the early anchorage, the place of simple things—simple love, simple joy, and simple peace. Blessed is that man who, after the wearings of sensations, turns again to the pure springs of childhood, to the pure and crystal river of God's pleasures.

"I am to be gathered unto my people." So Jacob's troubled and cloudy day is hastening swiftly to its close. For his comfort, in that shadowy hour, he needed a God whose gracious power could deal with his past. The grace of the Lord can fetch fragrance from desert places; his forgiveness can distil the "dews of quietness" from noisy and rebellious days. Yes, his mercy sets sunshine over the place of our shame, and his love plants lovely hopes and possibilities in the desecrated homes of our moral defects. In the evening of his day Jacob looked back upon the forgiving ministry of God's grace. The angel with whom he wrestled in the night never again left his side; and so at evening time it was light.

FRIDAY, June 13. Psalm 37: 27-40. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace." That is a precious and inspiring hope, to know that the end of the day will bring peace. After the stormiest voyage there is the assurance of a quiet haven. "The dreariest path, the darkest way, shall issue out in heavenly day." That, I say, is in itself a radiant and quickening hope: to know that every step taken by the upright man is a step nearer the end of trouble and the beginning of eternal rest. He is marching surely toward the lily-land of eternal peace.

But we know something better than this, something which the psalmist did not know. We can be not only stepping out towards the land of rest, we can be carrying peace with us all along the way. "My peace I give unto you." That is not peace as a promised inheritance, it is peace as a present possession. It is not associated with some future change of circumstances, it belongs to an abiding mood of the soul. We can have peace on the troubled sea before the haven is reached. We can have peace "when all about tumultuous seems." We can have "a heart at rest" on the ways of hard and burdensome toil. This peace is not a consummation, it is a companion; it is not an ultimate reward, it is a daily fellowship.

To have this peace we need the Lord of peace. To enjoy his rest we must rest in him. When we delight in his communion we share in all his gifts.

SATURDAY, June 14. Psalm 90: 1-12. Numbering things is one of the healthful exercises of the spiritual life. Unless we count, memory is apt to be very tricky and to snare us into strange forgetfulness. Unless we count what we have given away, we are very apt to exaggerate our bounty. We often think we have given when we have only listened to appeals; the mere audience has been mistaken for active beneficence. The remedy for all this is to occasionally count our benevolences, and see how we stand in a balance-sheet which we could present to the Lord himself.

And we must count our blessings. It is when our arithmetic fails in the task, and when counting God's blessings is like telling the number of the stars, that our souls bow low before the eternal goodness, and all murmuring dies away "like cloud-spots in the dawn." Yes, a walk down the endless series of providences is a fine cure for melancholy, and a splendid tonic for a despairing soul. "Count your blessings."

And we must also "number our days." We are wasteful with them, and we throw them away as though they are ours in endless procession. And yet there are only seven days in a week, and only fifty-two weeks in a year, and "the years of our life are three-score years and ten"! A day is of immeasurable preciousness, for what high accomplishment may it not witness? "Give me health and a day," says Emerson, "and I will make the pomp of emperors seem ridiculous." Yes, but a day in health or in sickness spent unto God and applied unto wisdom will gather treasures more precious than rubies and gold.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

older in your feelings than you are in fact. Therefore never withdraw your interest from life. See what is going on, and care for what is going on. It is a good thing for a man to set his affections on things above, and to have investments in heaven; there is a time for these things, but they are not inconsistent with a knowledge of what is taking place below. Men should let the heart of the times brood upon their hearts."

In this spirit those who are advancing in years may cause the sun in their life to stand still, for a while at least. Let us see what some grand old men have done for God and their fellow creatures: John Wesley, the preacher, lived to be eighty-eight years old. Arnauld, the theologian and sage, translated Josephus in his eightieth year. Dryden, in his sixty-eighth year, commenced the translation of the Iliad. Dr. Cary, the founder of missions, acquired many of the dialects of India after he was quite advanced in life. Michael Angelo was still painting his giant canvases at eighty-nine years of age; Titian, at ninety, painted with the vigor of youth, and kept on painting until he was ninety-nine. Franklin did not commence his philosophical pursuits until he was fifty. Newton, at eighty-three, worked as hard as he did in middle life. Verily, it would seem that there is now no age at which a man—or woman—may retire! An old lady was running over the catalogue of her ailments to her physician, and he replied, "What would you have, madam? I cannot make you young again." "I know that, doctor," she replied, "what I want you to do is to help me grow old a little longer." The best prescription for that is to serve, day and night, in His temple, and among the sad, and weak, and helpless ones of God's household in this world. Let no one say, "I have outlived my usefulness," but let each spur himself to be and do and live for God and his little ones, and so renew his life day by day.

This lesson should be as good for the young as for the aged. It should teach them to be more appreciative of the aged members of their families, and make them think how they can add to the lives of the aged with whom they come in contact by taking them into their plans and pleasures, considering them as comrades rather than "old folks" or "back numbers" no longer interested in events of the day.

MEMORY IMPROVED

Since Leaving Off Coffee

Many persons suffer from poor memory who never suspect coffee has anything to do with it.

The drug—caffeine—in coffee, acts injuriously on the nerves and heart, causing imperfect circulation, too much blood in the brain at one time, too little in another part. This often causes a dullness which makes a good memory nearly impossible.

"I am nearly 70 years old and did not know that coffee was the cause of the stomach and heart trouble I suffered from for many years, until about four years ago," writes a Kans. woman.

"A kind neighbor induced me to quit coffee and try Postum. I had been suffering severely and was greatly reduced in flesh. After using Postum a little while I found myself improving. My heart beats became regular and now I seldom ever notice any symptoms of my old stomach trouble at all. My nerves are steady and my memory decidedly better than while I was using coffee.

"I like the taste of Postum fully as well as coffee."

Postum comes in two forms.

Regular (must be boiled).

Instant Postum doesn't require boiling but is prepared instantly by stirring a level teaspoonful in an ordinary cup of hot water, which makes it right for most persons.

A big cup requires more and some people who like strong things put in a heaping spoonful and temper it with a large supply of cream.

Experiment until you know the amount that pleases your palate and have it served that way in the future.

WHERE WAS THE GARDEN OF EDEN?

WHERE was the Garden of Eden? What are the facts? It has been confidently located in half a dozen different localities, Australia and the North Pole included. The great majority of scholars for ages have favored the head waters of the Tigris and the Euphrates. Frederick Simpich, of the United States Consular Service, in his recent article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, places it forty miles west of Bagdad on the Euphrates. After years and years of worry, beaten about by conflicting authorities and great names, I was led by a few simple facts in the case to differ from all the authorities known to me. After solving the problem on the basis of fact, I waited long, hoping to find another who had abandoned the learned authorities and had been led by the same facts to the site of the Garden of Eden. Ten weeks ago I was gladdened by finding such an one. He is an archeologist of international standing, is associate editor of the oldest theological quarterly in America, is permanent lecturer on Biblical Archeology in Xenia Theological Seminary, consulting editor of records of the past, member of the American Oriental Society, the Archeological Institute of America, the Society of Biblical Literature and Exegesis, the Archeological Department of the University of Pennsylvania, and of the Vorderasiatische Gesellschaft of Berlin. I refer to Melvin Grove Kyle, D.D. You will find his article in the Sunday School Times, p. 4, January 4, 1913.

What are the facts? (1) The garden was in Eden, eastward in Eden. (2) A river on its way out of Eden watered this garden. Do not forget that this is one, not four rivers, and that you are looking down stream. (3) Now the very next words of the ancient narrative turn you round and face you up stream and you see at once that four heads or sources combine to form this one river. "From thence it was parted and became four heads," not four mouths. The garden therefore was below the junction of the four and was watered by the one made up from these four. Of course the ancient writer, as translated for us, says this in a way very awkward to us, but he says it.

Now, take a good map of the country at the head of the Persian Gulf with its river system and compare this ancient description with it. On your left as you look north is the Euphrates, the last river named in the old document. On its right as we look north is Mesopotamia, the last land named. Then comes the Tigris River or Hiddekel, the third river mentioned, with a land on its right called Ethiopia or Cush. Then comes the second river and the second land. Then the first river and its land. There are but four main rivers to this very day, not three nor five. What about the one river formed by the four—the great river which watered the Garden as it went out of Eden into the Persian Gulf? Six thousand years of wear and tear have not placed it beyond recognition. The great flood of Noah came and went without completely destroying it. It is still conveying to the gulf the waters of the Euphrates and the Tigris. For a short distance it yet conveys the water of the second river, while no geologist can doubt that it once carried the waters of all four.

Not even the name of the second land should stagger an ordinary thinker. Who is this Cush who gives his name to the land? Is he not a son of Ham? See Gen. 10: 6. What was the final dwelling-place of his descendants? Ethiopia in Africa. Where previous to that? Ethiopia in Arabia, east of the Persian Gulf. Where previous to that? In the ark and near where it landed. In his migrations southward to his Arabian home why should he have not tarried long enough to give his name to this country as he later did to two other regions? And is it strange that in the lapse of millenniums we should have lost the historic data confirming this old historic document in its namings? Are not enough of its items confirmed by the present geography, by history and by archeology, so that we should easily trust it in the three names lost and the one name under discussion, Cush or Ethiopia? Do not the facts show that Eden was above the Persian Gulf and below the junction of the Tigris with the Euphrates? If so was not the Garden on the great river not far above the gulf?

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY

AT THE eighty-eighth annual meeting of the American Tract Society held May 7, President Wilson and Governor Baldwin of Connecticut were elected honorary vice - presidents. During the year 39 new publications had been issued, 25 in English, and 14 in foreign tongues. The number of English publications for the year was 1,455,495 copies; and of foreign publications, 1,587,079 copies. A new Italian hymnal has been issued and a new Spanish hymnal is now in the hands of the printer. During the year in the home field 101,999 volumes were distributed through 100 colporteurs by sale or grant; the number of meetings held by colporteurs was 7,688, and of family visits by them 295,242. The distribution of Christian literature in thirty-three languages and dialects at Ellis Island and the port of Boston reached 204,665 publications. The value of publications distributed free has been $19,882.24 at catalogue prices, which includes $1,044 for libraries that have been sent to Sunday schools, mission schools and struggling churches. Those pages of the report that treat of the society's work in this country make it clear that it is an agency of the greatest importance in carrying the Gospel to the masses of immigrants from Central and Southern Europe.

The "foreign cash" appropriations made during the year totaled $5,100. Some idea of the extent and value of the society's missionary literary work abroad may be gained from the fact that the total foreign cash appropriations during the society's existence reach the sum of $789,895.39, and the grants of electrotypes, $61,126.16.

So much for the past. The needs of the present and of the immediate future—in respect of Eastern Asia alone—are colossal in magnitude, even as regards only China and Japan. The society says that millions of dollars for the circulation of the printed page are needed in order that they may know, even intellectually, the true Gospel, and one million is definitely asked for from the American public for this purpose. A matter of urgent importance to the society itself is the necessity for an early reduction of the principal of the mortgage on its building, 150 Nassau Street, New York City, and an appeal is made for $500,000. If this amount, or any considerable portion of it, is obtained, an endowment will be practically assured, and through the saving of interest the resources available for missionary work will be substantially increased.

A Welsh Pastor's Appreciation

It struck me that the latest issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was extraordinarily rich in material. THE MAIL-BAG contained so varied and instructive a correspondence. The sermon on the "Forgotten Secret" by Dr. Campbell was magnificent. Dr. Jowett's "Daily Meditations" are refreshing and invigorating. Even the Crafts and Miss Sangster seemed to me to have excelled themselves. May you still continue to flourish.

PARSON PICKARD'S MISSIONARY BOX

Marion gaily with her pencil poised. "I am all ready for business. You are to head the list. See, I have you already registered. How does this sound? 'Mrs. Elinor Pickard, only wife of Silas R. Pickard, the beloved pastor of an obscure little church in Rockville, Ore., aged thirty-nine years, three months and sixteen days; weight 110 pounds; would probably weigh more under more affluent conditions; height, five feet two inches; waist measurement, twenty inches.' Now please make known your wants."

"There, that will do," replied her mother reprovingly. "Never mind about me. Begin with your father first."

"All right, daddy dear, what shall it be?" questioned the daughter fondly.

"Well, just at the present moment," returned the father thoughtfully, playfully pinching her ear, "I am conscious of one very pressing need; but it could hardly be stowed in a missionary box."

His attempted cheerfulness did not deceive his wife, for she at once detected a troubled note in his voice, and in answer to her look of inquiry the story of his mishap came out.

"Yes, you certainly need a buggy, above all things," she answered, after a brief moment of contemplation of the facts. "But of course we could never think of asking a Ladies' Aid Society for such a thing. It would be preposterous. It'll be bad enough to ask for the other things, and really I should hesitate to express all of our wants."

"Now, I'll tell you what let's do," suggested Marion with youthful optimism: "let's jot down everything we would like if we were rich, and just see how they would look on paper. Then we can select from the list only the things we actually must have."

"Agreed," replied her mother with an indulgent smile, "but we should hardly know where to begin first."

"Oh, daddy's buggy must head the list," remarked the young girl confidently, as she quickly made a note of the item. "Now, what comes next?"

Then followed a long line of wants, including clothing, shoes, wearing apparel, household goods, curtains, bedding, blankets, rugs, carpets, and the multitude of things that are considered indispensable in the ordinary household but which would be counted luxuries in the home of a pioneer preacher. It required some urging before Mrs. Pickard could be induced to breathe her desire for a black silk dress for best, and a brown serge for second best, with possibly some shoes and a pair of black kid gloves.

"Seeing we are making believe, I think you had better put me down for a bicycle," said Ted importantly.

"And I want a pony and cart, like Walter Sims," echoed Johnny wistfully.

Marion obligingly recorded these impossible demands, and as she did so she was reminded of the beautiful set of furs that belonged to Walter's sister Nannie. She had often enjoyed the privilege of stroking the large, furry muff that to the touch seemed like something alive, and which Nannie asserted kept her hands as warm as toast. That suggested to her another of Nannie's proud possessions, and she held out a plump white arm reflectively, wondering how it would look adorned with a gold bracelet like Nannie's. She was doubtless impressed favorably, for it appeared on the list along with the set of furs.

She handed the completed list to her father, who looked it over attentively. It surely was a formidable array, but with few exceptions—the dream wants of Marion and the boys—there was nothing mentioned that was not sorely needed. The more he studied it the more he doubted his ability to discriminate in preparing a reasonable list to submit to the Aid Society. He realized, as never before, their deprivations and utter lack of life's comforts and his failure to supply them for his dear ones.

Disheartened, he reluctantly gathered writing materals together and penned a letter of appreciation and thanks for the prospective box. He advanced a few suggestions as he registered the age and measurements of each individual member of the family, then left the matter to the judgment and discretion of the Ladies' Aid Society.

There was a flutter of interest in the Ladies' Aid Society when Parson Pickard's letter was read. Nods of approval were noticed among the members of the box committee. They were thinking how easily and quickly his modest demands could be executed. This was so unlike some of their former experiences, when letters of that character had contained an inordinate list of wants, in tone rather dictatorial and exacting, with minute directions as to width of hem on sheets and pillow cases, or the required fulness of ruffles, or perhaps the correct size of pocket handkerchiefs.

Some one called the president's attention to another letter that, unnoticed by her, had dropped to the floor. She seemed puzzled over its contents for a moment, but after reading a few lines her countenance lighted up. It was evident to her that a mistake had somehow occurred, and it had inadvertently been enclosed in the envelope with the letter.

Although it was clearly not intended for them, she felt justified in reading it aloud to the assembly of women. It was in clear, girlish handwriting, the headlines expressing volumes and explaining all.

"Things the Pickard family would have if they were very rich. Things that would make us all comfortal and happy, but which we never exp to have, and that Mother says wo be perfectly preposterous to ask a L dies' Aid Society for, and which it useless for me even to wish for, l alone express on paper.

"First, we would buy a buggy f daddy. (His collapsed this P.M.)"

On down through Marion's exhaus ive list the president continued un she reached the last few articles. Sl paused with choking sensations as sl read:

"A bicycle for Ted, a small pony an cart for Johnny, and a set of brow furs (large muff) and gold bracel for Marion."

Evidently as a conscientious afte thought was added: "It is perfectl scandalous for us children, in our ci cumstances, to crave such luxuries— but we really don't mean it. MARIO PICKARD."

The hushed silence that followe was at last broken by Mrs. Gaynor chairman of the box committee, wh rightly interpreting the sympathy ex pressed in the faces, rose and mad a motion that Marion's list be give consideration and supplied as far a was practicable and possible.

"Are we expected to send them a buggy?" asked one woman in vagu alarm.

"As for that," replied Mrs. Gaynor who had recently acquired an auto mobile, "I shall be glad to provide no only a buggy, but a surrey also, i which the family can ride. I have no further use for them and they are tak ing up room in the garage."

Another, whose son had discarded a perfectly good bicycle for a motor cycle, said they might count on that for Ted.

Numerous other offerings came in so rapidly it seemed as though the Pickards' wants were about to materialize.

HOW "FLAG DAY" WILL BE CELEBRATED

THE American Flag Association, which is composed of members of patriotic societies and Flag Committees in the various States, united for the purpose of fostering public sentiment in favor of honoring the flag of our country, has issued the following appeal on account of Flag Day, June 14th:

"We respectfully appeal to the President of the United States of America, to the Governors of all the States of our land, and to the Mayor of each American city, to herald the coming and celebration of Flag Day, June 14, 1913, by proclamation; we call upon every public officer, every teacher of the youth of our country, the editors of all newspapers, the daily instructors of the youth of our land, to call public attention, to arouse enthusiasm, and to provide for public exercises and general celebration of the day.

"We earnestly exhort our citizens to join in making Flag Day an event, and its celebration in 1913, a great event. Let us, from one end of our land to the other, fling the Stars and Stripes to the breeze on June 14, 1913. May it greet the rising and salute the setting sun, and float all day long from every church edifice, school and building, public and private, and however humble, throughout the entire land."

And in order further to inspire the patriotism of all of our readers, we are sending with the flag a copy of the Declaration of Independence—a facsimile of that priceless document which has been locked away in the archives of the Government.

Here is an opportunity to keep faith with your patriotism, an opportunity to celebrate Flag Day in a fitting manner.

The Rev. Silas Pickard was engaged preparing his sermon one Saturday rning, a few weeks later, when he s interrupted by an expressman at e front door.

"Good morning, parson; looks as if might be goin' to start a carriage ctory," remarked the man with a in, as he pointed to the array of hicles he had in tow.

The bewildered clergyman looked er the bill of lading. It called for ne box, one bicycle, one buggy, one rrey, and one trunk."

"I was somewhat expecting a box, but there must be some mistake about the other things," he argued. "They cannot be intended for this place."

"Oh, I guess it's all right," insisted the man. "Anyhow, I had orders to leave 'em here, and that settles it." And he hurried out to unload.

The sermon was forgotten in the unrestrained excitement that enveloped the Pickard household the remainder of the day. It was a question whether they slept any that night. It was long past midnight when Mrs. Pickard found her daughter lingering over the fascinating contents of the trunk, fondling a set of beautiful gray furs, and softly crying over a gold bracelet and a ring that were enclosed in the envelope with a letter that revealed a mother's yearning and a mother's grief.

Sleep was impossible for Mrs. Pickard as well. Her heart was so full of thanksgiving for the generous gifts. There was everything she could wish for, even to the black silk for best, and the brown serge for second best.

Peggoty seemed quite conscious of the new acquisition as she surveyed the surrey and its happy occupants on the way to church the next morning.

The sermon was so uplifting and full of heartfelt fervor, it is doubtful if any one of the little congregation recognized it as an old one taken from the barrel.

It ever remained a mystery to the Pickards how that Ladies' Aid Society learned just what they all wanted.

BOWERY MISSION TESTIMONIES

TOM KELLY

MANY'S the night I have sat in this Mission and laughed at what was said. I was a "wise guy." I knew it all. used to hear them say "The Lord is y Shepherd, I shall not want." I anted everything. Oh, yes, I was ise, and yet I did not know enough to ed myself. I laughed at the Bible. did not believe in Christianity, and t with all my wisdom I came to be a oor despised "bum." I lost all my iends. I lost my wife, my children, y home, everything. A nice fellow I as, to laugh at religion!

I was born in this city, and within a one's throw of this Mission. I knew e Bowery from end to end when I as a boy. When I was young I was ade to go to Sunday school and urch, and I was brought up decently. ut when I got control of myself, I ent to sea, and then it was that I oke loose through all restraint, and ved a wild drunken life, and by the me I ought to have known something knew nothing.

In my seafaring life I went to all arts of the world. When on land I raveled in every section of this coun-y, but wherever I went my highest m was to earn money for the purpose getting "booze." I have been im-risoned for drunkenness in nearly very big city in this country.

My life on the Bowery is well known. lot of you men have known me for ears. I see some sitting here to-ight who sat with me in the "Billy oats," the "Doctor's" and other laces on the Bowery hundreds of mes, waiting for a "live one" to come long, that we might "soak" him, and o through him, and take everything way from him that he had. It seems ke a horrible dream to me now. And ometimes I shudder to think what it neans if ever I went back to it. Why, ather than that, I'd go and make a ole in the East River.

I didn't belong to myself. I was orking for nothing or nobody but the um-sellers. I didn't even think of buy-ng anything to eat. Just rum; that as all. "Scat" was what I lived for. often when on a voyage my mates and I would swear by all above us that on reaching port we would rig ourselves out in new clothes. Once, going to Londonderry, Ireland, we threw what we had left overboard, leaving just enough to cover us, so we'd have to buy. Then we got our pay and went ashore. All I bought was—a pair of socks. The rest of my money was spent for drink.

This was my horrible condition when I came in here a year ago last month; a poor, despised and friendless bum, with no other idea in his head than rum. I had been on a drunk for two weeks, and was not then sober. But I was hungry, and I sat through the meeting wishing many times that some of the speakers would drop dead so that the thing would be over and I would get something to eat. I had been like that hundreds of times. I cannot understand why things happened as they did that night. But when the invitation was given and the little Brotherhood card was offered to me I took it. After the luncheon was over I went down to the docks and slept there. I felt that card in my pocket, and somehow that night I did not feel half as miserable as the night before. I hadn't prayed for years, but this little card in my pocket seemed to be telling me to pray. I used to know some prayers when I was a boy, but I had forgotten them. I just sat there on the dock, and, feeling helpless, I asked God (I don't think I uttered any words, but the prayer was in my thoughts) to have mercy upon me. I prayed in my own way. God knew what I wanted and he heard me. It has never entered my head to go and get a drink since. Oh, how quickly God took drink out of my life when I asked him!

The next night I came to the Mission and joined the Brotherhood. I have been here almost every night since. I have had work to do. I have had money in my pocket. I have lots of friends. I am hoping to find my wife and children whom I have not seen for years. God has taken me out of the gutter and placed me upon my feet, and by his help I am never going back to the old life of "Kelly the Bum."

The Howard Watch

THE World's Record for speed on the water is held by a motor boat—45.22 miles an hour. A measured mile in less than one minute and twenty seconds: Howard time.

Forget for a moment that speed-boat racing is a sport. Consider its practical results. At any given price, compare the motor boat of today with that of a few years back.

In every American industry, you will trace all its progress to hard-headed efforts to beat the record for efficient use of time.

When you see a concern forging ahead of competition, stamping its individuality on the trade—there you find the HOWARD type of man putting the thing across.

The HOWARD Watch owner may be the titular head of the concern, the Superintendent or Department Manager. It is just as likely to be some inspired youngster, who would probably disclaim any part in moulding the career of the business. As if he could help exerting the power he does!

A HOWARD Watch is always worth what you pay for it.

The price of each watch is fixed at the factory and a printed ticket attached—from the 17-jewel (double roller) in a Crescent Extra or Boss Extra gold-filled case at $40, to the 23-jewel at $150—and the EDWARD HOWARD model at $350.

Not every jeweler can sell you a HOWARD WATCH. Find the HOWARD jeweler in your town and talk to him. He is a good man to know. Admiral Sigsbee has written a little book, "The Log of the HOWARD Watch," giving the record of his own HOWARD in the U. S. Navy. You'll enjoy it. Drop us a post card, Dept. THE FATE OF EVANGELISM principle to be the dynamic and inspiration of the entire movement. Luther had this in "Justification by Faith," Finney in "The Responsibility of Choice," Moody in the doctrine of "Grace." Such a principle will be additional, not substitutional. While not slighting the other great fundamentals of religion, some truth will be brought into the forefront that has never received the emphasis its importance deserves. I believe we have such a truth in the Lordship of Jesus.

We have already proved the inspiring power of this principle in attracting men. Let the rallying cry of evangelism be, "Make Christ King." King in the home, in business, society, politics, as well as the church. Then the coming decade will see the mightiest tidal wave of revival that Christendom has ever known.

The Root of the Trouble Frankly Stated

NO TRUE evangelist can fail to be in accord with what Dr. Chapman says in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and evangelists and pastors will do well to take careful heed to his words of warning. I feel convinced, however, that in addition to the sensational, high-pressure methods and exaggerated statements employed by some well-meaning and I doubt not entirely honest-hearted evangelists, several things have combined to put present-day evangelism in disrepute with many good people.

First, the unguarded, superficial and unfair statements of workers in connection with a recent nation-wide movement, who were not themselves sufficiently trained or fully instructed in regard to the methods or work of the evangelists they criticized to be able to judge fairly or intelligently.

Second, the attitude of pastors who profess to have no sympathy whatever with spectacular methods, sensational straining for effects, questionable schemes for raising offerings, doubtful advertising and exaggerated counting of converts, and yet who employ or vote to engage men whom they accuse of doing these things, forgetting the large number who do not.

Third, the highly-colored reports of evangelistic meetings in the public press. Many editors seem to think people do not want to read sermons like those preached by Mr. Moody or Dr. Chapman. This is a serious mistake. The Brooklyn Eagle, the Chicago Inter-Ocean and other papers have proved that great masses of people will read and appreciate strong, straightforward Gospel sermons. Mr. Moody doubtless reached for good more people through the press than he did from the platform, but if his sermons had been garbled, or the things he said rewritten to appear startling or sensational, it is doubtful if they would have been read as generally or would have wielded the influence for good they did.

Now, the cure for the blight that has fallen on all aggressive Christian work and especially on modern evangelism, in our day is found simply in old-fashioned honesty, consisteney and fairness to the truth in pulpit, press, platform and pew. Modern critics are just as prone to blink facts and stretch the truth as were their fathers before them. High-toned thinking does not always issue in high and holy acting or living. Unfortunately, jealousy still finds work for idle brains to do, no matter what the grade of brains may be. A false modern statement in public can beat the old-fashioned lie every time, although we all know it could get out of sight before truth could lace his shoes.

True Evangelism Still Holding Its Own

I THINK you are right about the consecrated evangelist. I do not think that the evangelism of Acts 1 and 2 is dying out to-day. I grant you that it is, however, with many pastors and churches. My experience for the last fifteen years has been that the average pastor is not bringing men and women to Christ—not even during the revival meeting itself. This is a sad fact, but it is true! I am glad there are some exceptions. Now, somebody must win them to Christ. It seems to me that the true, consecrated evangelist is an absolute necessity. The evangelist who preaches in a Christlike spirit the four great Rs, Ruin by the fall, Redemption by the blood, Regeneration by the Holy Ghost, and Reception by faith, will always be in demand and bring results. That style of evangelism is not dying out.

I think an "Evangelistic Federation" might be a good thing, if it were carried out right and had consecrated men at the head and to preach the great fundamentals of the Bible.

Answers to List No. 4

Here are the correct answers:

1. What is declared to be better than a dead lion? A living dog. Eccles. 9: 4.

2. Where is the assertion made that the crooked cannot be made straight? Give three passages in which this statement is contradicted. Eccles. 1: 15. Contradicted in Isa. 40: 4; 42: 16; 45: 2 (also Luke 3: 5).

3. Where is a cart-rope mentioned, and in what connection? Isa. 5: 18. Of the wicked, drawing sin as with a rope.

4. Find two passages in which the figure is implied of water running up-hill. Isa. 2: 2; Micah 4: 1. (Also Isa. 8: 7, 8; Jer. 46: 7-8; Jer. 47: 2).

5. What prophets rebuke those who use false balances? [Passages not found in the Book of Proverbs.] Hosea 12: 7; Amos 8: 5; Micah 6: 11.

6. In what Psalm is God's faithfulness six times declared? Ps. 89.

7. Where in the Old Testament are the circumstances and the place of the Saviour's birth foretold? Born of a virgin. Isa. 7: 14. In Bethlehem. Micah 5: 2.

8. Where does Paul state that God's covenant of grace was actually older than his covenant of law? Gal. 3: 17.

9. The Jews of what city demonstrated their nobility by searching the Scriptures to see if the message of the apostles were true? Beroea. Acts 17: 11.

10. What two classes of people does Paul declare are united to each other and to God by the blood of Christ? Jews and Gentiles. Eph. 2: 11-16.

Many readers had difficulty with the fourth question. Three other passages besides those giving the expected answer were counted correct. Many others had to be rejected because, while there was a suggestion of water rising, as in the crossing of the Red Sea and the Jordan, the references were in no sense figurative, but merely statements of fact. The wording of the question clearly indicated that other passages were called for.

HOW WEAK EYES ARE STRENGTHENED BY EXERCISE

By C. Gilbert Percival, M.D.

IN this, which is undoubtedly the most active period in the history of man, every one of our faculties is called on to do more, and to respond to a longer continued extraordinary strain than ever before.

"Take things easy" may be very good advice, but most of us, who know how our competitors are hustling, fear that the practice of it would furnish us with a free seat on a beneh in the park, instead of a cash income.

More energy, more concentration, are required to keep up with the leaders nowadays—hence our nervous exhaustion is greater. Busy city life with its clang, clatter and rush, even most of our time-saving inventions and modes of travel, keep the nerves on edge, and give them no opportunity to rest during our waking hours.

Now the eye is one of the most delicate centers of the nervous system. This is clearly proven by the fact that the first place a physician looks for symptoms of paralysis is at the base of the optic nerve—if there are none in evidence it is taken as positive proof that there is no danger.

This will clearly evidence that nerve exhaustion means eye-exhaustion and finally eye affection if nothing be done to correct it.

If, however, the blood circulation in the eyes is kept normal by the proper kind of simple and safe exercise, they continue healthy, normal and strong.

Beside this nervous strain that I speak of there are many other features of modern life which tax the eyes unduly.

Our schooling, once confined to the simple rudiments of education, is now so extended that the books of a schoolchild of to-day would cause a child of thirty years ago to look aghast—hence at the threshold of practical life we start to unduly tax our eyes.

The glitter of city streets—the speed of traffic—the riding in fast trains—the viewing of scenery from train windows as it flashes quickly by—and above all, the habit of reading every time we have the opportunity in our busy careers, under all sorts of unfavorable conditions—these all add to the extraordinary burden which our eyes are asked and expected to carry without assistance of any kind.

And, remember that though your arms may rest, your body may recline, and every limb, and other sense may be to a great extent dormant at times, your eyes are always seeing unless they are closed—always active during every waking hour.

Hardly any wonder, then, that eye strain is so common and up to recently so many have had to call on artificial aid in order to see at all.

You know the eye is just like a little camera. It has the lens with the iris opening which enlarges and contracts agreeably to the amount of light existing. It also has a dark chamber which may be compared to a camera bellows, and the retina corresponding to the sensitive plate. It has three sets of muscles—one turns the eyes in any direction, one controls the iris, and one operates the focus.

When, through nervous exhaustion or over-taxation, the circulation of blood in the eyes becomes weaker than is normal, these muscles become flabby and refuse to act up to their usual standard, and the eyes do not focus easily if at all. Premature old-sight is the result.

The muscles still do their best to focus properly; eagerly struggle and strain to properly do the work which your brain commands them to do—strain and struggle so hard in fact that they affect the tired nerves, and not only cause headaches, of which this is the most fruitful cause, but put the entire nervous system under a pressure which extends to the stomach and digestive organs, and brings on nausea and dyspepsia.

What eye specialist is there who has not heard from his patient: "Why, I had no idea in the world that it could be my eyes." There are many physicians in fact, who look to the eyes for one of the first causes of stomach trouble.

It is perfectly amazing, in reviewing the progress of science, surgery and medicine in the last fifty years, that the methods of correcting eye affections, even of the simplest kind, seem to have been entirely overlooked.

Science in physiology is correcting deformities which used to require harnesses or mechanical support. Surgery is correcting displacements which heretofore caused life-long confinement. Physicians are departing more and more from the old-fashioned practice of continual drugging, and using more rational methods of restoring and preserving health.

But, until the recent discovery of this system of exercise to which I refer, no matter how simple your eye-trouble was, you were told that you had to wear eye-glasses.

Now, eye-glasses are not necessarily to be despised. They are a great invention in their way—so are crutches.

But you would not relish the anticipation that you had to use crutches all your life—nor would you. Just as soon as your sprained ankle, for instance, were in condition to stand it, your doctor would instruct you to touch it to the ground gradually and exercise it to bring back the normal circulation necessary to enable you to discard your crutch. Exactly the same with a broken arm—exercise it as soon as possible to bring it back to normal.

The wearing of eye-glasses is just exactly like using a crutch for life. Instead of growing stronger by their use, the eyes grow weaker, and you probably are well aware of the fact that in order to see perfectly the wearer of glasses must change them from time to time for new and stronger ones.

Let us see what authorities say on the subject of eye massage: Doctor De Schweinitz, of Philadelphia, Professor of Ophthalmology in Jefferson College, makes the statement that in treating so serious a condition as dreaded cataract of the eye, massage of the eye-ball "has been followed by improvement in vision and deepening of the anterior chamber." The Medical Record, in writing of the same serious ailment, urges the great value of "any means that would bring an increased blood supply" and considers that "the most feasible plan seems to be properly applied massage."

It would of course be impossible to satisfactorily or even safely give this massage (or exercise) with the hands, but this problem was successfully solved a few years ago by a New York specialist, who realized through experience how many troubles of the eyes could be quickly corrected by this method.

The greatest and most practical inventions usually seem the simplest and most obvious once they become known, and this one is no exception to that rule. So simple is it that anyone can use it in their own home without instruction, yet it is so safe that there is not the slightest chance of giving the eyes anything but great benefit, no matter how long they may have been affected.

This system of exercise is fully explained, also many interesting scientific facts about the eyes are given in a little book on the subject, which will be sent without cost if you address Charles A. Tyrrell, M.D., 134 West 65th Street, New York, and mention having read this article in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

It may, with reason, be suggested that at no time could this system have been perfected more opportunely than now. At no time has the world demanded more perfect men and women; and if your eyes are weak, whether you wear glasses or not, it is not necessary for any one to point out its disadvantages—perhaps you even consider glasses a disfigurement to a certain degree—surely they are an inconvenience.

Of course you cannot put new muscles in an eye, as you would a new tire on an automobile, but you can restore health to these muscles and give them the renewed strength that assures the thorough performance of their natural work.

Personally I have seen this system in a few months make a boy of eighteen entirely independent of glasses who had worn them continuously for twelve years; also enable old folks over sixty to discard their glasses in an incredibly short time. Therefore, I believe it is safe to assume that many thousands of spectacles will cease to be useful as this system becomes generally known, and I am sure that everyone whose eyes are affected in any way, whether a wearer of glasses or not, will be greatly interested in the little book which tells so much about the eyes and their care.—Advt.

Are You Going to Gettysburg?

THE GREAT SEMI-CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION AND REUNION WILL BE HELD ON THE FAMOUS BATTLEFIELD JULY 1 TO JULY 4

Grand Army Veterans Will Camp in 6,000 Tents and Over a Quarter of a Million People Will Witness the Ceremonies on the Bloodiest Field of the Civil War

On another page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be found a vivid description of the ceremonies which will take place on the Battlefield of Gettysburg from July 1 to July 4—the fiftieth anniversary of the bloodiest battle of the Civil War. Grand Army veterans from every State in the Union, North and South, will camp in 6,000 tents on the field where once 30,000 of their comrades fell wounded or dead, and interested spectators to the number of 250,000 will gather to absorb the lesson of the horrors of war, which the greatest of Civil War reunions must surely teach.

The Horrors of War Teach Us the Blessings of Peace

It will not be possible for every one to absorb this lesson on the battlefield itself, nor is it absolutely necessary. The art of photography can bring it home vividly enough to us all. Mathew Brady, the government war photographer, was present with his camera during all of the great battles of the Civil War, and the result is a collection of photographs that make a wonderful plea for Peace. The blood of a thousand dead heroes cries out through these prints in protest against such carnage being allowed to take place again.

Mathew Brady died practically in the poorhouse, and for years his wonderful collections lay neglected in the government archives. Recently they were reproduced by order of the United States War Department and incorporated in which is offered to readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

You will see through the pages reproductions of the war photographs taken fifty years ago of campgrounds, battlefields, regiments, hospitals, men in the trenches, dead, wounded, dying, and great leaders on both sides, all by the faithful reproduction of the famous Brady War negatives. 1,576 separate Brady War Photographs are shown in the work. There are 512 pages for the text, photographic reproductions from the Brady War Photographs, War Maps and a Chronological Record from the Government Records in the War Department giving every engagement, with names of troops on both sides and showing the total losses and casualties throughout the four years of the war.

The entire work is printed on fine enamel paper, in large and clear type specially made for the purpose. The engravings are made direct from the Brady photographs by the best engravers obtainable. The whole book is profusely illustrated with these engravings, scarcely a page being without illustration.

Over 30,000 Union and Confederate Soldiers Were Killed and Wounded on This Battlefield

This Is One of the 1576 Brady Photographs

(USED BY SPECIAL PERMISSION OF THE U. S. WAR DEPARTMENT)

Which Are Included in Lossing's History of the Civil War

This great work has been completed after months of labor and an expense of thousands of dollars in its preparation, and the result is a magnificent book of great historic interest to all Americans.

Think of it! Copies of the real photographs "taken on the spot" by Mathew B. Brady and his men during the whole four years of the war. It was a feat without a parallel. General Grant saw many of the photographs taken, and in a letter in 1866 said: "The collection is valuable for the present generation, but how much more valuable for future generations!" General Grant joined Generals Butler and Garfield in stating that these negatives were worth $150,000. They are not merely imaginary sketches of what an artist might think, but real speaking likenesses of the great men who made history and the historical scenes and thrilling events of the time.

THE GOVERNMENT PAID $27,840 for these negatives, and they went into the archives of the War Department; but the people of the country never saw them. They were not serving their great educational purpose. The War Department granted permission to reproduce the photographs in this popular form, desiring to place them within the reach of all the people.

In Addition to the 1576 Brady Photographs

the work is further embellished with sixteen full-color plates of great battles and naval fights.

1. Grant in the Wilderness
2. Sheridan at Five Forks
3. Sherman at Kenesaw Mountain
4. Thomas at Chickamauga
5. Hooker at Chancellorsville
6. Meade at Gettysburg
7. McClellan at Antietam
8. Burnside at Fredericksburg
9. Battle of Shiloh
10. Sheridan's Charge at Winchester
11. Siege of Vicksburg
12. Battle of Gettysburg
13. Siege of Atlanta
14. Farragut at Mobile
15. The "Kearsarge" Sinking the "Alabama"
16. Battle of Spottsylvania

It is an amazing fact that fifty years after the war a faithful copy of the wonderful Brady War Pictures, taken at the risk of his life, can be obtained.

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

The Cross of Every Man*

IT WOULD be a wholesome exercise for every one of us to face the question squarely: "How much is it costing me to follow Christ?" It is quite likely that most of us are not making anything like the sacrifice we ought to be making for the cause of Christ; perhaps many of us are making practically no sacrifice at all. Yet these things, cross-bearing, hardship, sacrifice, are almost integral elements of Christianity. It is hard to have vigorous, fruitful Christianity without them. Our faith came into being through the blood of Christ; it was kept alive and nourished by the blood of martyrs; even in present times Christian converts in foreign lands suffer and in some cases die for the faith. Yet we take our religion listlessly, easily, luxuriously. When any one asks us what cross we are bearing for Jesus to-day it is hard to find any.

Cross-bearing does not mean that we are to be morose, burdened Christians. We are to be jubilant warriors; but we ought really to be at war, really fighting something that is antagonizing the kingdom, really fighting to win souls from the dominion of evil, and to spread the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth.

Christian America needs to learn again the lessons of heroism and self-denial. It is positively humiliating, for instance, to read the figures of the money spent every year for chewing-gum and then to compare it with the sum invested in the effort to bring the heathen nations to the Saviour. Even in the matters of our food and dress and ornament we are careless. Missionaries on furlough in the United States often gasp at the way their religious friends and allies in this country spend money, say, for their lunches in the city. A sum of money will be tossed lightly away for one luncheon for the missionary's friend and himself that might support a native worker for a couple of months, or keep a native boy in school a fourth of a year.

We must not forget that Christianity is at present on a war basis. Within reason we ought to be living on war rations, with war equipment. While millions are yet without the Gospel, while millions more, both in Christian and heathen lands, are living in misery and want, the Christian must give himself and his time and his money to push the campaign that the Master outlined, the campaign of salvation and philanthropy.

It may, perhaps, make our duty still plainer when we consider the athlete. Every boy knows what it is to be "in training." Girls are learning what it means, too, now that basket-ball and other contests are open to them. Certain kinds of food cannot be eaten because they keep the body from being at its best; regular hours of sleep and exercise must be observed. "They do it," says Paul, who would have known all about baseball and football and basket-ball if he had been alive to-day, "to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." If other young people, or if we ourselves, will bear these crosses to win honors for our school or college or town, what sacrifices ought we not to be willing to make to win triumphs and honors for Jesus?

But there is a still deeper meaning to our lesson, brought out particularly in the passages assigned for Scripture study. That is the great, first sacrifice that one who would be a Christian must make of his will to the will of God. Many Christians are living a perplexed, almost fruitless life because they have not clearly settled it in their own minds that they are going to be true to God at any cost. Christ said that the soul of the man who would follow him must die, die to its own aims and desires and determinations, even as the grain of wheat dies when it falls into the ground, in order that it may bring forth "much fruit." God's will is best. It is also kind and sweet. The life that is based on a full surrender to him, and that is lived in whole-souled carrying out of his purposes, is the happy as well as the successful life. We are to be crucified with him; yet we are to live exultantly, victoriously, the new life of faithful service. See Gal. 2: 20; 6: 14; Rom. 6: 4-11; Col. 3: 1-15.

Straight Paths*

WE HAVE all been annoyed, on sidewalk and street crossing, by people who did not seem to have any very definite idea where they were going. The whole business of walking in crowded streets would be greatly facilitated if everybody had his mind made up where he wanted to go and would keep moving in that direction at a reasonably regular rate of speed. But saunterers, loiterers, wobblers, mix things up badly.

The passage from the Proverbs to be studied to-day, in which occur a number of "favorite verses," gives us the picture of a person who knows where he is going and is making it his business to go there. He is traveling in the way of "wisdom"; it is a straight, clear way, not always easy, it is true, but straight and plain. "I have taught thee," says the wise man, "the way of wisdom. I have led thee in right paths. When thou goest thy steps shall not be straitened (or tangled, hindered); and when thou runnest, thou shalt not stumble."

Right here occur two of the "favorite verses" that everybody ought to know by heart. They are bits of invaluable advice to the people who want to walk straight: "Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not in the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away." Here is another (verse 18): "The path of the just is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

There are times when the light on certain problems is not very clear; the thing to do then, if we are sure we have been going in the right direction, is to keep right on. Don't make a turn until the command to do so is made overwhelmingly convincing. Keep on the old road, even in the dark, and the light will come back again, and grow brighter, shining "more and more." Here is another good piece of counsel for steady travelers (verse 25): "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee." The feet are very apt to follow the eyes; keep them straight, and the feet will follow.

After all, it all depends, as we find even here in the Old Testament and in the Wisdom Book, upon the heart. This is another verse that every one should know and often repeat (verse 23): "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." The margin of the Revised Version reads: "Keep thy heart above all that thou guardest." A pure heart and a steady eye will keep you on the straight path. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews adds the most necessary advice of all: "Let us run the race, . . . looking unto Jesus." This will make our going absolutely safe, and absolutely sure to end in victory.

a log cabin without any windows. s father was a Baptist preacher who : his living by milling grain for the mers. A church provided him with ee papers, one of which was THE RISTIAN HERALD. There were, how- r, no educational facilities; and en he ran away at the age of four- n he knew little more than his let- s. For several years he did not re to go into a church and on a cold nter night went into a mission in ncinnati more for the sake of get- g warm than anything else. That s the beginning of the change. en came work for ten hours a day, lowed by the spelling-book and der till midnight; mountain evan- ization, two years' salary amount- to less than fifty dollars; a matic inauguration of rescue work d of aid for orphans; to-day two ge institutions with glorious rec- ds of past and present.

With regard to the important ques- n of what may be termed the "loaves d fishes" in mission work, the Rev. an Callahan, whose mission shares th the Bowery Mission and the ater Street Mission a country-wide me for the excellence of the free als furnished, discoursed forcibly on eir practicable value as baits for shers of men." Among other things mentioned the fact that when the odigal son got hungry he went home his father's house to get food; and id he thought that if more food were nded out at the churches, now repre- nting the Father's house on earth, ere would not be so many prodigal ns eating free lunches in saloons. ferring to the regular "rounders" who have been eating free meals at the various missions for years and have not yet been "landed," he described them as a distinct asset to the institutions in so far as they acted as decoys to younger men by telling them first of the free meal and then of the place where it could be obtained. He also cited instances in which the said "rounders" had at last been duly "landed" themselves—sometimes after many days.

The field of labor of Mr. E. C. Mercer is in the universities, colleges and preparatory schools of the country. A university man himself, who was graduated from the park benches and the Water Street Mission as well as from his alma mater, he is singularly qualified for the preventive efforts in which he has been successfully engaged for many years. Perhaps the most encouraging statement he made was to the effect that never in the history of the colleges and universities of the United States has there been so much real vital Christianity among the students, finding expression in all manner of home mission work as well as in the daily life lived out before the men with whom they are in contact. As to the causes of the "going wrong" of university men (himself included), he mentioned as among the most important the desire of popularity and the lack of foresight and reflection as to the probable results of action taken at the moment. As a curious illustration of the latter, he said that he had recently seen a man come out of a saloon and fall heavily to the sidewalk, cutting himself severely. Yet he counted twenty-one young men pass over that man's body into the saloon itself; not one of the twenty-one stopping to consider that he might one day be himself like the prostrate man over whom he walked.

A delightful feature of the convention was the entertainment of the delegates at the beautiful estate conducted by the Rev. G. S. Avery at Chester Crest, Mount Vernon, N. Y., for the reclamation of intemperate men. The characteristic hospitality won an equally characteristic appreciation from the pan-State company of guests.

That evening, in the course of Dr. Wilbert White's forceful presentation of the importance of bringing individual converts into direct contact with the Scriptures, he took occasion to give his indorsement to the work of "Billy" Sunday; he did not approve of the way in which some things were done and he wished that some things were not done at all; but a two-day attendance at the meetings at Wilkesbarre, Pa., followed by a third day of inquiries among all classes of people, had caused him to revise an opinion expressed by him some time ago and impressed him with the fact that Mr. Sunday was preaching the real Gospel in the power of the Holy Spirit, with results equally remarkable and important.

All the officers of the Federation were re-elected for the coming year, and fourteen names were added to the list of directors. These additions afford a tangible proof of the expansion of the valuable influence and operations of the Federation, which will be held next year at Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

wail of regret went up from my very ul that the other two brigades of my l division had been left behind. Oh, d, if only I had them—a surety for e honor of Virginia! for I can de- nd upon them, little one. They know ur soldier and would follow him into e very jaws of death—and he will ed them, right here, too, before he's rough.

"At early dawn, darkened by the reatening rain, Armistead, Garnett, mper and your soldier held a heart- heart powwow.

"Just as we three separated to go r different ways after silently clasp- g hands, our fears and prayers iced in the 'Good luck, old man,' a mmons came from Old Peter, and I mediately rode to the top of the dge where he and Marse Robert were aking a reconnaissance of Meade's sition. 'Great God!' said Old Peter I came up. 'Look, General Lee, at e insurmountable difficulties between r line and that of the Yankees—the eep hills, the tiers of artillery, the nces, the heavy skirmish line—and en we'll have to fight our infantry ainst their batteries. Look at the ound we'll have to charge over, early a mile of that open ground ere under the rain of their canister d shrapnel.'

" 'The enemy is there, General ngstreet, and I am going to strike m,' said Marse Robert, in his firm, iet, determined voice.

"About eight o'clock I rode with em along our line of prostrate infan- y. They had been told to lie down prevent attracting attention, and ough they had been forbidden to eer, they voluntarily rose and lifted reverential adoration their caps to ir beloved commander as we rode owly along. Oh, the responsibility r the lives of such men as these! ell, my darling, their fate and that our beloved Southland will be set- ed ere your glorious eyes rest on ese scraps of penciled paper—your oldier's last letter, perhaps.

"Our line of battle faces Cemetery Ridge. Our detachments have been thrown forward to support our artillery, which stretches over a mile along the crests of Oak Ridge and Seminary Ridge. The men are lying in the rear, my darling, and the hot July sun pours its scorching rays almost vertically down upon them. The suffering and waiting are almost unbearable.

"Well, my sweetheart, at one o'clock the awful silence was broken by a cannon-shot and then another, and then more than a hundred guns shook the hills from crest to base, answered by more than another hundred — the whole world a blazing volcano, the whole of heaven a thunderbolt—then darkness and absolute silence—then the grim and gruesome, low-spoken commands—the forming of the attacking columns. My brave Virginians are to attack in front. Oh, may God in mercy help me as he never helped before!

"I have ridden up to report to Old Peter. I shall give him this letter to mail to you and a package to give you if—oh, my darling, do you feel the love of my heart, the prayer, as I write that fatal word?

"Now I go; but remember always that I love you with all my heart and soul, with every fiber of my being; that now and forever I am yours—yours, my beloved. It is almost three o'clock. My soul reaches out to yours—in my prayers. YOUR SOLDIER."

A few days after the battle Pickett wrote:

"I can't think of anything but the desolate homes in Virginia and the unknown dead in Pennsylvania. At the beginning of the fight I was so sanguine, so sure of success! Early in the morning I had been assured by Alexander that General Lee had ordered that every brigade in his command was to charge Cemetery Hill, so I had no fear of not being supported. Alexander also assured me of the support of his artillery, which would move ahead of my division in the advance. He told me that he had borrowed seven twelve-pound howitzers from Pendleton, Lee's chief of artillery, which he had put in reserve to accompany me.

"In the morning I rode with him while he, by Longstreet's orders, selected the salient angle of the wood in which my line was formed, which line was just on the left of his seventy-five guns. At about a quarter to three o'clock, when his written order to make the charge was handed to me, and dear old Peter after reading it in sorrow and fear reluctantly bowed his head in assent, I obeyed, leading my three brigades straight on the enemy's front. You never saw anything like it. They moved across that field of death as a battalion marches forward in line of battle upon drill, each commander in front of his command leading and cheering on his men. Two lines of the enemy's infantry were driven back; two lines of guns were taken—and no support came. Pendleton, without Alexander's knowledge, had sent four of the guns which he had loaned him to some other part of the field, and the other three guns could not be found. The two brigades which were to have followed me had, poor fellows, been seriously engaged in the fights of the two previous days. Both of their commanding officers had been killed, and while they had been replaced by gallant, competent officers, these new leaders were unknown to the men.

"I wonder, my dear, if in the light of the Great Eternity we shall any of us feel this was for the best and shall have learned to say, 'Thy will be done.' "

V. H., Pattonsburg, Mo. Please tell how gravitation exists, or its principal cause.

No one can explain the source or reason of gravitation. All that we know is that it is a law governing the position and movement of material bodies. Every material body has the property of attracting others to it; the greater the body the greater the attraction. For instance, all detached bodies near the surface of the earth are drawn down toward the center of the earth; the moon is drawn toward the earth; the earth is drawn toward the sun. The earth is prevented from falling into the sun, and the moon from falling to the earth, by centrifugal force, by which a body moving in a circle tends to fly from the center of the circle.

Mrs. E. R. K., Conway Springs, Kan. What did Jesus mean in his wonderful prayer in the seventeenth chapter of John: "Thine they were and thou gavest them me"? Why were they his more than all the rest who came to him, and why did he pray specially for them? Do not all belong to the Father equally?

It may be true that in this prayer Jesus was praying for all who were believers in him at that time, as well as for all who should come to believe in him later (see verse 20). But the prayer has been almost universally understood as a special petition for his disciples. And it is perfectly true that they were given to him in a special sense. Others were and are given to him to receive his salvation and his love. These men were given to him to be his closest companions and to be the official founders of his church.

J. T. H., Long Island, N. Y. 1. James 2: 1, which in the Authorized Version reads "My brethren, have not the faith," etc., should read "hold not the faith," and is so rendered in the Revised Version, which makes the sense clear. The apostle tells them that they are not to exercise "respect of persons," while they hold the faith, for God is no respecter of persons. 2. Confession is good for the soul. Your attitude in the matters referred to is the right one. Lean hard on God and pray hard, and he will open a way to set you right again.

W. H. W., Greenridge, Mo. Gen. 3: 14, 15 must be taken in connection with the preceding verses. First, the temptation (verses 1-5), next the fall (verses 6-9), then the examination (verses 10-13), then the sentence (verses 14, 15) and lastly the promise (verses 16-19). The passage you quote is the sentence. The serpent which Satan had used as his emissary, was degraded, branded with infamy and avoided with horror. The tempter, who had assumed the serpent's form, was doomed to be still more degraded than he had been, and his power was to be destroyed by the offspring of those he had deceived. "Thy seed" (addressed to the serpent tempter) meant not only evil spirits but wicked men; while to the woman it was promised that her posterity should bruise the head of the serpent, which in anger would wound the heel that crushes him. The promise to the woman is interpreted as a prediction of the coming Messiah.

E. H. H., Coal City, Ind. 1. When do we Gentiles receive the gift of the Comforter? Do we receive the Holy Spirit when we make a change for the better? 2. Does the Holy Spirit guide us in any way before we become converted?

1. The Holy Spirit is received at conversion, but the baptism with the Holy Spirit is an experience which comes usually at some time after conversion. The disciples were regenerated men when Jesus told them to tarry in the city of Jerusalem until they should be baptized with the Holy Spirit (Acts 1: 4-5). This was the experience to which he had previously referred as the coming of the Comforter (John 14, 15, 16). 2. God's Spirit is constantly trying to get into a man's heart. He speaks to him in many ways, convicting of sin, urging to repentance, etc. It is also likely that many of the impressions leading to a wise and safe course of action, which a man may receive before he is converted, are really the messages of the Holy Spirit. God is very good, and tries to help us in every way. But it is not until one has become a child of God and received the fulness of the Spirit that he can expect to have the clear guidance of the Holy Spirit. Even then such impressions and messages must be tested by sane judgment, by the Word of God and by counsel with Christian friends.

L. E. Mendenhall, Sebastopol, Calif., writes asking some reader of this journal to send him a copy of the poem which contains these lines:

"A bittern's boom came far
On a free and bridgeless tide."

E. H. J., Colorado, Texas. 1. The American Congregational churches are orthodox in the general sense in which the term is accepted by all Christian churches. They hold the Scriptures as the rule of faith and practice. Baptism by sprinkling or affusion is the general custom. 2. For passages relating to backsliding or apostasy see Acts 21: 21; II Thess. 2: 3; I Tim. 4: 1; Heb. 6: 4, and 10: 6; Matt. 24: 13; Heb. 10: 38; Luke 9: 62 and others. 3. Many sermons and books have been preached and written on the Beast in Revelation with varied results. The subject was recently treated in THE MAIL-BAG.

M. S., Cuthbert, Ga. 1. The passages in Ezek. 40 and 47 and Haggai 2: 6-9 are a prophetic picture of the restored Jewish temple. The temple referred to in Habakkuk 2: 20 is his "place" (Isa. 26: 21) in heaven, of which the Jerusalem temple was a type. 2. Ezek. 34: 23 points to Christ, the true David of Israel, of whom David, the shepherd king, was the type.

E. H. P., Montesano, Wash. 1. The best commentators place the martyrdom of Stephen about A.D. 29 and Paul's conversion in A.D. 30. 2. The change in the priestly order and in the law (referred to in Heb. 7: 12) took place at the meeting of Abraham with Melchizedek. "Before that meeting Abraham had the general promises and the special one of a natural seed, and so of Levi; but the promises under which Christ was comprehended were given after Abraham met Melchizedek and received his blessing." Psalm 110: 4 is taken by Paul as presupposing a change or transference of the priesthood which carried with it also a change of the law, which is inseparably bound up with the priesthood (see Heb. 7: 11). 3. Matt. 25: 31-46 is a description of the Last Judgment. It has been the theme of innumerable sermonic discourses, although it is not as familiar a pulpit topic to-day as it should be.

F. C. R., Elk Garden, W. Va. The ancients had only a dim perception of the destiny of the soul of man and of the future life. It was not until Christ himself declared the existence of the soul after the death of the body (II Cor. 5: 1) that the world began to understand. He "brought life and immortality to light" (II Tim. 1: 10). With regard to the theory of conditional immortality to which your letter refers, the discussion of the subject has been voluminous and inconclusive. The essential point for the Christian is to hold fast to the divine promise in the Gospel, which shows the way of eternal life, and refuse to be drawn aside into speculative doctrines which no man can assume to decide with authority beyond what is revealed in Scripture.

Mrs. M. K., Jamestown, N. D. Is it possible for one to be saved without knowing it? If one is really converted will he know it so definitely that he can testify to the fact?

Among the children of Christian homes or among conscientious heathen (see Rom. 2: 14, 15; Acts 10: 34, 35), there may be cases in which a soul has salvation and is not definitely conscious of it. In the vast majority of cases, however, since the turning toward sin has been definite and voluntary, so the turning from sin and the receiving of forgiveness and a new nature are so definite as to be matters of plain

The Babylon Photographs

THE full page of photographs that accompanied Dr. Edgar J. Banks's recent article on the excavations of the German scientists at Babylon has attracted a great deal of attention. We have been asked by whom they were secured and how such work is carried on. These special pictures were taken by a representative of the famous photographic company, Underwood & Underwood, of New York, and are copyrighted by that firm. They represent one activity of this concern, whose photographers have covered practically the entire civilized world and have gone even beyond the outposts of the army of progress to bring back to us scenes from wild and barbarous countries or from the almost forgotten cities of ancient civilization. Mr. Burt Underwood says in referring to the Babylon pictures, "We have for a number of years had as our purpose the covering of every section of Biblical importance. We knew from the first that it would be far from commercially profitable, yet we have literally accomplished what we undertook to do. Practically every spot associated with Biblical literature and history has been carefully covered by the company's operators. This work has necessitated travel in lands where it is extremely difficult, slow and expensive, decidedly out of the beaten track, and where the photographer struggles against climatic conditions that are almost insurmountable. Our payment for this work, however, cannot be in dollars and cents. It must come to us, if it comes at all, in recognition of the work we have done in Bible lands to bring them to the eyes of the millions who cannot travel."

ANSWERED PRAYERS

FROM Hazelton, Pa., L. M. writes: "I have been very much interested in reading of answers to prayers. My prayers have been answered for my dear wife, who has just undergone a serious operation. It seemed as though she could not be spared to us, yet the Great Physician heard our prayers and the change has come for the better, blessed be his name! There is nothing that soothes the heart when burdened with so great a trial as a little talk with Jesus."

A lady from West Virginia writes: "I was in sore distress, the clouds of sorrow so thick that not one ray of light gleamed through. I besought God with all my heart to avert the impending calamity—and I am now out of the shadow. Verily he is our God in the storm as well as in the sunshine. I was greatly encouraged by an answered prayer in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD."

Mrs. J. Bushfield, another of our large circle of aged friends, writes from Brockville, Ont.: "I come with praise and thanksgiving to my kind heavenly Father for his great goodness to me in healing me of two diseases. When we lay our will aside and say: 'Father, thy will be done,' we are sure God will meet with us and we will have our desire. God loves to be trusted." Mrs. F. M. S., of Hagaman, N. Y., writes: "I wish to acknowledge my heartfelt thankfulness to God for the restoration to health of a dear daughter for whom I prayed constantly."

E. S. D. writes from California: "I would thankfully acknowledge God's goodness in answering many prayers for health and other blessings to me and mine." A reader from Oxford, Ont., writes: "I would like to say to all weary ones that God surely answers prayer if we pray earnestly and believe. I was sick, and thought there was no help for me, but prayed at all times. Often at my work when I was so weak and felt pretty blue I would sing hymns. Oh, how they comforted me! I wish every one would pray and sing hymns when they feel sad; it will surely help them." Mrs. H. W. M., of Minneapolis, Minn., writes: "I cannot remember the time when I did not believe that 'all things are possible with God.' I wish to testify to Jesus' power and willingness to heal all manner of sickness and disease now as when he was on earth, for he is the same 'yesterday, to-day, and forever.' I believe that he has healed me from two diseases."

C. A. O. writes from New York: "I wish to acknowledge the goodness of God in answering my prayers for the recovery of my daughter, who was seriously ill. Often have my prayers been answered when I was in sore trouble."

Acknowledgments of answers to prayer have also been received from:

knowledge. The New Testament clearly teaches that those who become converted may receive the witness of the Spirit, assuring them that they have been born again (see Rom. 8: 16; I John 5: 10). Any one who wants to be a Christian or hopes he is a Christian may receive this assurance if he persists in trusting Christ. Our salvation depends, not upon our feeling, but upon the unchangeable fact of the atonement and upon the plain promises of God's Word. When we definitely trust we become conscious of certain definite changes in our experience. Fear of God changes to love of God; we love God's people and his work. If we continue faithful the witness of the Spirit will be added to these signs and we shall know that we are children of God.

R. C. S., Gainesville, Ga. To those who are really children of God and who have received forgiveness through Christ, sin is no longer imputed and temptation loses its power, as they are endowed with divine strength to resist it. Christ died a sacrifice for all, and the gift of free salvation is offered to all who repent.

Subscriber, Three Forks, Mont. The first five books of the Bible, called the Pentateuch, are usually ascribed to Moses, but it is obvious that at least the last chapter of Deuteronomy is by another hand. Their authorship has been a subject of extensive controversy. The Jews themselves hold rigidly to the belief in Moses' authorship. Many modern scholars believe they have discovered traces of a later writer in these books, but the majority still retain the old belief that they are of Mosaic origin.

Constant Reader, Paterson, N. J. 1. The vote (or any other method of deciding certain questions except the lot) does not appear to have been employed by the ancient Hebrews. 2. In its fullest interpretation, the suffrage would include the right to hold office.

H. T. Fasting was voluntary in the early Christian Church. It was charged by his enemies that Christ's disciples "fasted not," while those of John did fast (Matt. 11: 18, 19). Our Lord did not positively enjoin religious fasting, and indeed he alluded in terms of censure to the frequent fasts of the Pharisees. His reference to the time which would come when, being deprived of the personal presence of the bridegroom, his disciples would fast, implied rather a season of general mourning than of self-denial. In the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 6: 17) he recognizes the practice, but leaves the frequency and extent to the individual judgment. Fasts were undoubtedly observed by the early Christians (see Acts 13: 2; 14: 23; II Cor. 6: 5), but these were probably a recognition of old established usage, handed down through generations. When it is remembered that a very large portion of the Christian church was originally Jewish, it is not surprising that fasting, which was so marked a feature under the old dispensation, should have been handed down from age to age and that it should be occasionally found to some extent in the church even at the present day.

Always Up-to-Date

By R. E. Olds, Designer

In Reo the Fifth, new ideas are adopted as soon as the leaders accept them. The car is kept up-to-date.

Thus, at any time this car contains about every new feature in sight.

And most of the time one finds the car months in advance of its rivals.

Reo the Fifth Roadster

Next Year's Cars

The evidence is that most next year's cars will adopt the following features. The leading cars already have them.

Note that Reo the Fifth, as we build it today, embodies all these coming features.

Left-side drive
Center control
Electric lights
Set-in dash lights
Oversize tires

There is no need to argue these. Note the leaders of Motordom—how all of them have them. There is no better evidence that cars without them will soon be obsolete.

One-Rod Control

Another feature bound to come is the Reo one-rod control.

Note what it means. No levers in the driver's way, either side or center. The driver's entrance on either side is absolutely clear. He never dismounts in the street.

All the gear shifting is done by one small center rod. It is done by moving this rod only three inches in each of four directions. Both brakes are operated by foot pedals.

No coming feature means as much to the driver as this simple rod control, this absence of levers, this clear entrance in front.

Things That Still Must Come

There are other features in Reo the Fifth to which cars of this class must come.

Men expect them in costly cars. But men are bound to demand them in any car when they know what their absence means. I refer to things like these:

Analyzed steel
Properly tested gears
15 roller bearings
190 drop forgings
High-test magneto
Double-heated carburetor
Vast overcapacity
Utter exactness
Slow, careful building
Insurance against flaws

I have spent 26 years building automobiles. I know their shortcomings—know what cars must stand.

Time will force all makers, as it forced me, into these extreme precautions.

Steel must be made to formula—must be analyzed twice—to be sure of the needed strength. Gears must be tested in a crushing machine, not with a hammer.

Timken bearings cost five times as much as common ball bearings. But they must be used, and used everywhere—not only in the largest bearings.

Drop forgings are costly, but steel castings too often have flaws.

Strength that seems sufficient often proves insufficient. Big margins of safety are needed. In Reo the Fifth, every driving part is given 50 per cent. overcapacity.

Parts should be handfitted and ground over and over. Every part should be given a radical test. Engines, after testing, should be taken apart and inspected.

We Do All This

In Reo the Fifth all these things are done. They are costly, but we save their cost by building only one model, by making all our parts, by modern machinery, by extreme efficiency.

Our price proves that such things need not be expensive—need not be confined to the high-cost cars.

As a result, each Reo the Fifth is an utterly perfect car. It is almost a trouble-proof car. The extra cost to us is saved over and over in your up-keep cost. And year after year this car keeps running as well as it runs when new.

More and more, the men who know demand this class of car. Our sales this year have broken all our records.

A thousand dealers sell Reo the Fifth. If you don't know the nearest, write or telegraph for address.

THE DUTCH WINDMILL

You - as a tire bill payer - now demand a vise-like rim grip - with no cutting or breaking above the rim - and here it is

It's the rim as much as the road that wears out your tires.

So we said to our Engineers:

"You must build us a tire with Perfect 3-Point Rim Contact."

They did—and they also added the No-Pinch Safety Flap for inner tube protection in

Then we called in our Chemists and said:

"Tire buyers are demanding a tough, flint-like, but resilient tread—a tire made of lusty young rubber—a tire giving the utmost mileage at no additional expense."

And the answer is

Vitalized Rubber

Diamond {No Clinch} Tires

Perfect 3-Point Rim Contact

Here is a No-Clinch tire that appeals to the hard-headed, shrewd tire-buyer—the man who insists on easy riding comfort and a good liberal mileage.

Each point of rim contact in a tire is a point of support. Where the points of rim contact are not perfect, undue pressure is brought to bear at an unsupported point of the tire.

Then what happens? The result is a terrific strain on the tire that results in rim troubles, breaking above the bead and separation of the tread from the carcass.

All this is overcome in the Diamond No-Clinch because the three points of rim contact are absolutely mechanically perfect—the annealed steel cable wire bead holds with a vise-like rim-grip.

Add to this the No-Pinch Safety Flap for inner tube protection, the Vitalized Rubber advantage, the famous Diamond Safety (Squeegee Tread) and you have bought rubber-shod mileage that has no equal at any price.

So this time buy Diamond Vitalized Rubber Tires—you can get them to fit your rims at any of the

A WEEKLY ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER FOR THE HOME

BACK AND FACE OF FIRST AND SECOND MIRRORS

THE ENLARGING MIRROR

THE REFLECTING MIRRORS IN POSITION FOR WORK

STUDYING THE WONDERS OF THE SUN

A SOLAR trust to study the sun has been formed. A few weeks ago an inconspicuous little despatch from New Zealand announced that Miss Mary Proctor had succeeded in linking the solar observatories throughout the world into a co-ordinated and co-operative group. Miss Proctor, who is the daughter of the famous English astronomer, Richard A. Proctor, has devoted years to this project. Since the death of her father in New York some years ago, she has worked steadily to the end which has now been made possible by the donation of $60,000 by Thomas Cawthron Nelson for the establishment of a solar physics observatory in New Zealand.

To each of the great solar observatories of the world a special field of work will be assigned, and the results compiled in such a way as to put the findings of the scientists in a more complete and comprehensive form than ever before. Of this great work the United States will have an important and interesting part, for one of the world's best solar observatories is that maintained by the Carnegie Institute of Washington on one of the twin peaks of Mount Wilson, California. From Los Angeles by trolley-car and burro-back up through the pine forests one reaches the observatory. No dome or gigantic telescope greets the visitor when he gains the summit. A huge Noah's Ark of canvas destroys all preconceived ideas of what an observatory should look like, and within three wonderful mirrors take the place of the great tubular telescope of other observatories.

The observatory building is constructed of canvas, the sides being set in the form of tiers of steeply overlapping eaves. This arrangement is calculated to allow for perfect ventilation and is reinforced by a vertical wall of canvas which can be raised or lowered at will to obtain an even temperature. The peculiar arrangement of mirrors that replaces the familiar telescope is the center around which all interest in the observatory revolves. These mirrors were constructed at the Yerkes Observatory, and are the finest products of the optician's manufacturing skill. The enlarging mirror, which is supported by a pier of stone at the farther end of the building, is of concave glass, four inches thick, and the scientists tell us it is of twenty-four-inch aperture by sixty-foot focus. The glass is polished every so often with jewelers' rouge upon pads of chamois-skin, and is burnished every week or ten days, in order to remove all possible dust. In addition, a galvanized cover is kept over it when it is not in use.

All of the mirrors at the observatory are mechanically arranged and weighted so that they may be set in any required position and held absolutely rigid. The mechanism which carries them is so arranged that it can be readily moved backward and forward to obtain a proper focus and to catch the reflection of any of the heavenly bodies in which the astronomers may be interested. The reflection of the section of the sun to be studied strikes the first mirror, primarily; this being tilted to the proper angle. Just as the schoolboy will flash a mirror at a friend across the street, so this mirror flashes that image to the second, the flat, circular mirror, standing on its massive iron column beyond. The second mirror, while normally upright, can be racked back, so as to set the reflection received in any direction desired. It therefore sends the rays on to the third mirror, the concave one, which does the enlarging, and so acts as does the lens in an ordinary tubular telescope. The principle is similar to that of the "bulging" or sunken mirrors in the city summer-resorts, which make the fattest man seem lean, or vice versa. Incidentally, though, it seems that the astronomers cannot reflect from the first mirror to the third direct with advantage, since they cannot hold the reflection so well and would have to keep changing their stations every so often. The effect of such changing is now accomplished by the second mirror.

MOUNT WILSON OBSERVATORY

Look into the enlarging mirror and see there the enlarged image of part of the flaming orb of day, sharp and distinct, revealing new secrets. To look more closely still a pocket magnifying glass is brought out, and with this somewhat unique arrangement the secrets of space are bared.

These mirrors have the main telescope building reserved for them—a building two hundred and thirty feet in length by thirty-five in width, with the height of roof given as ten feet. The floor here has its secrets too. The tented portion, in which the third mirror is installed, rests on a track so arranged that the entire outfit can be slid nearer or farther to the rest of the great building containing the two other mirrors. Behind this is a small dark-room inside the canvas superstructure, for star-work and the spectrum instruments. Still farther to the rear, but separated from the main observatory building is another stone pier, carrying a rotating mirror similar to the second of the series. This is known technically as the cœlostat mirror. This revolves on an axis that points due north, and has a glass surface thirty inches in diameter.

One stands watching the setting sun gild the mirrors, inviting to inspection and study, but that must be for the morrow, for it's 5.30 now, and supper-time. He follows the path lit by those last shafts of sunlight back to the rustic inn, and then to the veranda, where pseudo-students of the sun revel in that wondrous view over mountains and valleys and off into space—another valley, turned to blue—and to where a ship is visible away on the distant Pacific.

SPIRITUAL EBB-TIDE

A SERMON

BY

Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, D.D.*

TEXT: "And the people served the Lord all the days of Joshua . . . and there arose another generation. . . ." Judges 2: 7-11

THE Hebrew people, during Moses' forty years' leadership of them, had been instructed in the things of God; had witnessed what were to them incontestable proofs of God's presence and power; and had, moreover, been so subdued to the moral and spiritual sovereignty of Moses himself as to have become an altered people, quite substantially transformed from the servile condition in which inwardly and outwardly they had existed in Egypt, and had been made a worshiping congregation, with their hearts set actually, though fluctuatingly, in the direction of an ennobled national destiny.

By a happy Providence, when Moses' term of leadership and prophetic service was expired, he was succeeded by Joshua—a man in some essential respects the duplicate of Moses, grown up in immediate association with him and therefore the beneficiary of his spirit and purpose—and thus in a true sense the prophetic succession was secured. The Hebrew people held to the line laid down for them by the prophet of Sinai and were carried onward and upward, not simply by the momentum which had been accumulated under Moses' administration, but by the added increment of impulse conveyed to them by Joshua's own devout and heroic leadership.

So long as Joshua lived, and so long as the elders who had grown up under Moses and Joshua lived—maintaining by their presence and inspiration the established high tone of national life—it went well with the people. The spiritual influences conveyed to them through these inspired agencies were sufficient to repress the innate heathenism in their own souls, and to secure them against the invasion of the heathenism that existed in the barbarous tribes by which they were environed.

Losing the Momentum

It might have seemed as though a national life, initiated as theirs had been, might have maintained itself, and gone on at a level no less exalted, at any rate, than that at which it had moved in its introductory years under the two great prophets, but hardly had they died before the people forsook the Lord and their covenant with him.

And this entire Book of Judges is a prolonged series of illustrations of the principle that religious momentum, like every other species of momentum, soon becomes dissipated. The only condition under which momentum seems to preserve itself and even to go on accumulating is when it is operating on a down grade. But when working at a level, and still more when operating on an ascent, its expenditure is only a question of time and not a very long time.

Moses anticipated this, even while in a forlorn way hoping the contrary. In his final address he said to them plainly: "I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall you in the latter days, because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands."

This was not spoken by him out of a spirit of self-aggrandizement and with an ambition to accentuate himself as indispensable to the security and well-being of his country, but spoken rather out of a clear understanding of facts, and of the principles that operate both in individual and associate life, and that determine the processes of such life and its issues. Hebrew history, and all subsequent history, justify Moses' assumption that a religious impulse can be counted on for results only so long as it exists as an impulse; that such impulse tends to wear itself out, and that when outworn there is a reversal to the same conditions as obtained before the impulse existed.

The principle is important because of the variety of ways in which it works into practical results.

We will suppose the case of a man who has been born and nurtured in a Christian home, a home that is Christian not in name only, but in reality, pervaded by an atmosphere which fosters the growth of Christian thought and sentiment, and secures thereby the adoption and observance of fixed principles of behavior.

Character and life acquire by that means a certain momentum. That is a matter of common experience. So that if later on there be a change in environment and a removal from the influences which had been working with so beneficial an effect, there will not necessarily be an abrupt alteration in the tone of thought and conduct, but only a gradual diminishing of the force that had previously operated with such great effect and a scarcely perceptible modification of modes of feeling and action.

There are many young men and young women who are floating out to sea on an ebbing tide of old family religion; who have a relic of sweet loyalty for their childhood days, a sense of tender obligation to the chastening and sweetening influences by which they were then surrounded; who cherish toward the mother that is gone a sentiment that is akin to worship; and who, if they have not ceased to pray—which very possibly they have—do not omit to thank God for giving to them so dear a place in which to be born and reared; and not only thank God for that but are grateful for the results wrought in them by the mother's fostering care.

And yet it will very likely appear on investigation that there is a very wide discrepancy between the religious temperature of their souls and that which existed in their home days. A great many who originated under the domestic influences just described have become doubters, and religion has ceased to be a conscious power in their lives. The tide may have set still farther seaward, and their doubts have developed into agnosticism, and their agnosticism flowered out into atheism or into an attempt at atheism.

It is, however, perfectly consistent with all that, that their character retains very much of its old flavor. They are gentle, they are kind, they throw themselves ardently into humanitarian effort. They do not steal: they do not kill: they are neither debauchés nor vagabonds. And then they will point to themselves with admirable pride and ask you to realize how possible it is to be a man of pure life and exalted aspiration without borrowing any aid from religion.

Without the Sunshine

It is strange how many people there are in these days of schools and enlightenment that will put two and two together and make five of it. A plant stood up bravely in the evening twilight, a couple of hours after sunset, and remarked to a passerby, "Behold and see what a beautiful creature I am here in this dim evening light. There are some superstitious people, whose souls have been fed on old fables, who say that it is the sun that keeps flowers alive and that makes them grow in verdure and beauty. But look at me! Aren't my leaves green and glossy? Are not my petals beautifully crimson and the breath of my blossoms delicately fragrant? Why insist upon the need of sunshine when I can be such a splendid success without any sunshine?"

It cannot be difficult to appreciate the pertinence of our little allegory. The passerby would easily find words in which to retort upon the small and presumptuous philosophy of the little vegetable upstart, whose memory was so short and whose consciousness of the solar baptism it had been standing under only two hours before was so feeble and ungrateful. And the young man who remembers his mother, and who carries in himself the fruits of his mother's Christian nurture, but who is standing out of relation with his mother's God, and puts himself forth as example of what a man can be without God, shows himself as void of rational appreciation as the flower that thought its beauty to be explicable without reference to sunshine because it had been an hour or two since it had been bathed in sunshine.

But let us carry our allegory a stage farther. In due course, seeds gathered from this sprig of vegetable impertinence are taken by the florist and planted. Under the impulse of the negative philosophy taught by the plant the gardener, instead of laying the seeds in furrows that lie up warmly toward the sky, and where a direct touch of sunshine can be laid upon them as soon as they have sprouted up through the soil, deposits them in cold ground, and in some polar spot of earth where the shadows always lie and where even in the longest, brightest days of summer no immediate contact will be possible between the flower and the sun. What will naturally issue one does not need to be a florist or a botanist to determine.

Similarly, in due course, our young man, w thinks to have acquired the art of godless nobil of character, marries and becomes the father children. Religion is with him at best only a fo of philosophy, perhaps nothing better than a me ory; possibly he even scouts the whole idea, havi drifted clear out to sea on the ebbing tide of the religion of his dead mother. Momentum is pret well spent. Moses is gone; Joshua has follow him, as have also the elders that outlived Joshu and the heathen lie around very close and ve numerous, saying nothing of the little fascinati pagans that naturally populate the human soul.

We are now in a position to watch the natur outworking of tendency. There is no family alta no Sabbath which, when observed in sweet a trustful reverence, becomes a blessed reminder what the eye cannot see, nor the ear hear: no eve ing prayer in which the dear little souls of t children commit themselves and are committed the care of Him whose eye never slumbers n sleeps: there is in the atmosphere of the home no of that peculiar pervasive influence which operat with so definite effect to season the heart again the contaminating influences that seek to invade from outside the home.

The Home Without God

The right, therefore, has lost a great deal of it meaning because it has lost its divine meanin Everything that deserves to be called holiness ha gone out of life. Many of the words that othe wise have a just and dignified place in our commo vocabulary fall into disuse. The voice of conscienc as we used to consider it, becomes in a godless hom a mere warning against unpleasant consequence without being any longer a still small word o gentle remonstrance, issuing from the heart of On whose throne is above the sovereignty of even fathe and mother and established eternal in the heavens

"Religion" becomes merely a word on the lips o the child without any reality answering to it in th child's experience. Momentum of the generatio before is pretty well spent. The child is civilize but he is a civilized pagan. He is dressed like Christian. He is schooled like a Christian. H will, for convenience and respectability's sake, cop after the conventional proprieties of his parents; that is, he will, so far as it is necessary for him t do so in order to retain his position.

In a household conditioned like the one we have been describing, the worldly spirit becomes an influence that not only saturates the experience of the six days but with its rising tide becomes an inundation overspreading the remaining day. The father goes to church when he feels like it, and the children do not so often feel like it. The day is not observed as holy to the Lord, for it is not clear any longer that there is anything that is exactly holy, or any Lord for the day to be holy to.

There is just enough religious sentiment left in such a home to make its members feel that it will be safer to spend the after part of the day in secular entertainment and social dissipation if an hour or two of the forenoon is spent in some form of church service that is so ornate in its form and so unexacting in its demands as not to put too severe a strain upon the lingering remains of religious sensibility.

Now, if there were none of what I have called little pagans in the human heart, and no hordes of heathen influence in the world in the midst of which we are so closely set, then the old inherited religious momentum would be much slower in becoming dissipated; but in fact our surroundings are as full of a certain kind of Amorites and Jebusites as were the regions adjacent to Hebrew territory. We do not set up idols that we designate by that term, but to a very wide extent the dominant interest and devotedness of people is becoming monopolized by things, things that are as material and perishable as a dumb idol would be, as superficially fascinating as was the calf of gold which the Hebrews molded during the temporary absence from them of their inspired leader and lawgiver.

In the constitutional convention of 1787, so great were the difficulties encountered by the conflicting sentiments and interests of different parts of the

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, June 15. Ephesians 6: 1-10. A starling never reveals the richness of its hues until we see it in the sunlight. A duty never discloses its beauties until we set it in the light of the Lord. It is amazing how a dull road is transfigured when the sunshine falls upon it! God's grace reveals the graces in all healthy things. Hidden lovelinesses troop out when we set them in the presence of the Lord.

And so the apostle counsels an obedience which is "in the Lord." He wants us to know how beautiful common things can be when they are linked to Christ. And what he says about obedience he says about everything. One of the great secrets in the teaching of Paul is expressed in just this phrase, "in the Lord," "in Christ." With the apostle the relationship expressed in the preposition "in" mattered everything. It meant connection with a power-house whose energy would light up all the common lamps of life, the lamps of hope, of faith, of love, of human service.

And this is the secret of the Christian life. We need no other; at least all other secrets are involved in this. If we attend to this little preposition "in," we have entry into the infinite. If we are "in Christ," we are in the kingdom of everything that endures, and we are outside nothing but sin.

MONDAY, June 16. Amos 6: 1-8. The most delusive thing about sin is that it puts us to sleep. It uses spiritual opiates, and narcotics, and anesthetics; it makes us insensible, we do not know what is happening, and so it does its nefarious work. It makes us feel "at ease" in the midst of destruction, and we fiddle away while Rome is burning! When sin succeeds in drugging us we dance in levity and profanity on the very brink of the pit.

Now what we are pleased to regard as "little sins" contribute to this perilous sleep. It is amazing how much poison even a tiny bottle can contain. A drop of laudanum can hide itself in a mere thimbleful of apparently harmless liquid. And the evil one can instil a moral opiate in very slight transactions. Small disobediences bring on the dangerous "sleeping sickness." Tiny moral neglects produce heaviness, then stupor, then "deep sleep."

No one is competent to defend us from this insidious foe except the Lord himself. He knows all "the wiles of the wicked one," and he can resist and overcome them. "No plague shall come nigh thy dwelling." "Thou shalt not be afraid . . . for the pestilence that walketh in darkness." The Lord Jesus will protect us against all the perils of the enchanted ground. He will keep our spirit wakeful, and our senses vigilant to discern between good and evil. "The eyes of them that see shall not be dim."

TUESDAY, June 17. Isaiah 5: 8-16. "They regard not the work of the Lord. . . . Therefore my people are gone into captivity." When we ignore God we pass into bondage. There is no liberty in the far country. There may be the show of liberty, but it is only decked-out servitude. The devil intertwines his chains with attractive greenery so that they look like gay festoons on a gala day. But the greenery withers away and on the morrow we are faced with naked bondage. There is no liberty in a state of alienation from our God.

If we would have true freedom we must seek it in him who is the truth. The most exquisite freedom is that of children in their Father's house. There is obedience, but it is creative of delightful liberty. Contrast the restraint of a servant with the freedom of a child! Contrast the bondage of a visitor to Windsor Castle with the freedom of a son of the royal house! Doors and corridors are all open to the son of the house, to all his goings out and his comings in. And this is the freedom given to us all by the great Son of the house, even the Son of God. "If the Son therefore shall make you free ye shall be free indeed." "Ye shall go in and out," in "the glorious liberty of the children of God."

Bondage comes with sin, freedom comes with holiness. Bondage comes with exile, freedom comes with home. To forget God is to forfeit our franchise, to walk with him is to enjoy "the inheritance of the saints."

WEDNESDAY, June 18. Isaiah 28: 1-7. Here is a fleshly habit which has become a tyrant. "Through strong drink they are out of the way." The tyrant has gripped them and led them into foul ways of his own choosing. The body is riding the soul! The soul was purposed for heavenly flight, but "his heavy rider kept him down." The servant has become the master: the kitchen rules the house: appetite gives orders to the conscience and the will.

Now let me mark what follows when the flesh ascends the throne of the life. "They err in vision." The eyes of the soul are impaired. Moral discernment becomes dim. The difference between the holy and the profane becomes confused. Opposite colors blend into one another, and we cannot define their limits, and say when one ends and another begins. Whites mingle with blacks through intermediate grays. White lies join together the false and the true. Experiences and compromises destroy the contrast between low principle and high principle. We do not see things as they are, and we call good evil, and evil good. We "err in vision."

And then comes a further disastrous issue. When the flesh is master we "stumble in judgment." Even our practical judgment is confused. We lose our common sense. Common sense never dwells in the house where carnality rules. They cannot live together. Common sense goes away and practical folly takes her place. We stumble from one mistake into another, and life is filled with confusion.

THURSDAY, June 19. Titus 2: 6-15. Where there is soberminded-ness there will be sobriety in every part of the life. If the mind is drunk, if the thoughts stagger about in flippant and aimless wanderings, then every external habit will be lacking in moral strength. If we have only loose opinions in the mind, and no noble and firmly-rooted convictions, then everything else will be loose and inconsistent. If the monarch be a dissipated character his courtiers are sure to share his nature: and if the monarch be pure and morally invincible all the members of his court will "wear the white flower of a blameless life."

So that if we want to fight drunkenness we must begin in the realm of the mind. If we can establish a sober mind we absolutely insure a sober life. Material remedies will never cure a drunkard. A new environment will not redeem him. There are rich men and women, who are girt about with all the privilege and beauty that money can buy, who are nevertheless the pathetic and desolated victims of drink. Garden cities do not make garden minds, it is the garden mind that makes the garden city. If we can only alter a man's mind we most certainly transform his world.

And how is the mind to be changed? It cannot be done without the grace of the Lord Jesus. It is his blessed work. We can become "renewed in mind" in him. We can be "transformed by the renewing of our mind." When the mind has been refurnished all things will become new. Make a man sober-minded and all bestiality will go from his life as the wild beast vanished from the habitations of men before the pure knights of King Arthur's court.

FRIDAY, June 20. Daniel 1: 8-16. "Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself." A noble heart-purpose is the strongest watchman over external conduct. It is the purposeless life that has no defenses. A liner, with engine-power, and helm, and compass, and destination, can cut her way through the most tumultuous seas. A liner, destitute of helm, and compass, and errand, is at the mercy of every fierce and unfriendly sea. Daniel had the mighty safeguard of "a purpose true," and when floods of unfriendly circumstance beset him he held firmly on his course.

I turn from Daniel to the apostle Paul. He, too, had a purpose which dominated everything: "For me to live is Christ." That sovereign ambition was always on the throne. In every movement Christ must be honored! In every issue Christ must be glorified! The body must do nothing which will impair its fine fitness as a servant of Christ. The mind must entertain no suggestion which will make it a less holy temple for Christ. The heart must allow no sentiment or desire to sit at its table which would be an affront to Christ. The apostle led everything up to this pure and lofty purpose, and by it everything was accepted or condemned.

My soul! Cultivate the companionship of a glorious purpose! Never be caught in spiritual indolence. Let thy flag be always unfurled, and let this be emblazoned upon it: "For me to live is Christ!"

SATURDAY, June 21. I Thessalonians 5: 5-11. Can we think of a more beautiful figure than this—"children of light"? As I write these words I look out upon a building every window of which is ablaze with light, every room the home of attractive brightness. And my life is to be like that! And I look again and I see a lighthouse sending out its strong, pure, friendly beams to guide the mariner as he seeks his "desired haven." And my life is to be like that! And I look once more, and I see a common road lamp, sending its useful light upon the busy street, helping the wayfarer as he goes from place to place. And my life is to be like that. I am to be a child of light.

And if my soul is all lit up in friendly radiance for others the light will be my own defense. Light always scares away the vermin. Lift up a stone in a meadow, let in the light, and see how a hundred secret things will scurry away. And light in the soul scares away "the unfruitful works of darkness"; they cannot dwell with the light. Light repels the evil one. Yes, we are well protected when we are clothed in "the armor of light."

But how can we become "children of light," holy homes of protective and saving radiance? Happily it is not our lot to provide the light, it is ours to provide the lamp. If we offer the lamp the Lord will give the flame. "I am the light." Where he comes the soul becomes luminous. "Now are ye light in the Lord." "The Lord God is the light thereof."

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

country that the work of constructing a constitution seemed so on the brink of failure that Benjamin Franklin, an old man of eighty years, "proposed that as all human means of obtaining agreement seemed to be useless, the convention should open its meetings with prayer"—a mode of breaking deadlocks which if applied either at Washington or Albany would doubtless be regarded by the great majority of our citizens as of questionable propriety, even if not openly ridiculed.

That incident is stated simply to show our fallen religious temperature, diminished religious momentum, heathenism let in because of our not being consciously held under the enlightening and determining sway of God's wisdom and sovereignty.

And so I want to say in a finishing word that the best efforts that can be put forth by patriotism looking to the preservation of our national integrity and therefore to the stability of our institutions, will not be efforts that expend themselves in letting off fireworks or in oratorical expatiation upon the geographical magnitude of our country, or its colossal wealth, or even its educational facilities, but efforts that look to the staying of the swelling tide of social and financial corruption and of base commerce with all that is earthly and paganish, by interposing the breakwater of God's truth distinctly preached, of Christ's life uncompromisingly lived, and of the Holy Spirit availed of as strength to the purpose and light to the eye in all our daily walk and conversation.

IN MEMORY OF DR. MEAD

"I WAS married to my conscience many years ago; we have lived happily together ever since; it is too late for me to seek a divorce." These words, spoken some years ago by the late Charles H. Mead, D.D., when faced with a proposition which he believed to be a compromise, are a true index of his stalwart character. Courageous, genial, gifted, he numbered his friends by the thousands, and the news of his sudden death on May 6 brought genuine grief to many a heart. He had lectured, preached and sung in cities and towns and schools over the United States; he was well known as a writer and editor; he was prominent in the work of the Prohibition Party; his songs have been sung, his witty sayings retold, his bright personality admired far and wide.

At the time of his death Dr. Mead had been for thirty years associated with the National Temperance Society and had been since 1896 a member of its board of managers. He was also the editor of its literature and its most popular lecturer. As an editor his principal work was in bringing out the society's monthly periodical, the National Temperance Advocate. As a lecturer he traveled extensively, and there were few platform speakers in America who so steadily and brilliantly held and moved the audiences they addressed. Not only was his public speaking brilliant and impressive; it was also amazingly fruitful. He won many souls to an acceptance of the Gospel; he influenced temperance legislation; he induced many to sign the total abstinence pledge. He was permanent chairman of the National Prohibition Party, presided at its 1912 convention at Atlantic City, and was chairman and spokesman of the delegation which officially notified Dr. Chapin of his nomination for the office of President. Irresistible as Dr. Mead was as a lecturer and evangelist, he was, if possible, even more charming as a singer, and for many years traveled with the Silver Lake Quartette as its manager, leader and lecturer. He was the founder of the Silver Lake Temperance "Camp," which was for many years a center of temperance inspiration, organization and activity.

THE LATE CHARLES H. MEAD, D.D.

At the time of his death Dr. Mead was the president of the Bowery Mission where his presence was always hailed with delight. He was also one of the trustees of the CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home, and there was no more popular visitor there than big Doctor Mead.

Dr. Mead was born in New York City in 1841. He entered upon a business career but from early manhood was an enthusiastic Gospel and temperance worker. At Hornellsville he conducted with the Praying Band of which he was leader a great revival campaign in which nearly 1,200 souls were converted. He was led to give up his business activities and devote himself entirely to evangelism and reform. His wife was Elizabeth Bedell, who died six years ago.

Dr. Mead's funeral services were held on Friday, May 9, in the Marble Collegiate Church, New York. Dr. J. G. Hallimond presided, and addresses of loving appreciation were made by Dr. Hallimond, Dr. Leighton, Dr. A. B. Leonard, Dr. G. H. Sandison, editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Rev. Clinton N. Howard and Dr. A. A. Hopkins. Mr. B. F. Butts led the congregational singing of "My Jesus, as Thou Wilt," and "Abide With Me," and also sang with great tenderness a song, both the words and music of which Dr. Mead had composed, and which he had dedicated to the memory of his mother—"Beautiful City of Love."

At the interment in Greenwood, Dr. F. C. Iglehart delivered an eloquent eulogy over the body of his friend, and conducted the commitment service. The memorial service held in the Bowery Mission on May 22 was an occasion of deep spiritual blessing, and at its close, after an appeal by Dr. W. P. Ferguson, twenty-five men took the first step signifying their desire to lead a better life. Short, earnest addresses were made by Dr. Hallimond, Miss Sara Wray, Professor Hopkins, Mr. James T. Hunt, Dr. H. P. Lyman-Wheaton, Mr. George Cummings and many others. Solos were sung by Mrs. Hallimond, Mr. Butts and Mr. Hunt; the audience sang heartily, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," to the tune of Dr. Mead's own composition, "Triumph."

IMPRESSIONS OF THE FOURTH PEACE CONGRESS

THE week just closed (May 4) has been a week of paradoxes for St. Louisans. Within the gates of our city there were gathered in convention some 1,200 men and women, many of them of national and international fame, statesmen, clergymen, educators, authors, financiers. All were ardent in their advocacy of world-peace and of the abolition of war. Speakers drew volleys upon volleys of applause from their audiences, as they depicted the horrors of war and the glories of peace, the waste of life and earthly possessions caused by the former, and the far better application of life and means in the pursuits of the latter. It was all but proven that war is absolutely unreasonable, and peace the only reasonable thing.

While these events were transpiring, the first honorary vice-president of the Congress, who was to have addressed the Congress at its closing session on Saturday night, had hurried to Sacramento, Calif., to avert, if possible, a certain action by the Legislature of California which threatened to bring on war with Japan. There was a grim sort of humor in the remarks of one of our local editors, who discussed Mr. Bryan's failure with the California legislators, and pointed out that war and peace are not regulated by reason—certainly much to the regret of all good men.

Alongside of the reports of the Peace Congress we were reading of Austria's ultimatum to Montenegro, of the despatch of her picked soldiery, the Tyrolese mountain troops, to the Montenegrin border, of hurried conferences between the powers of the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente.

Thus this "peace week" turned out to be the most warlike week which we have passed through recently. When one remembers what Scripture says of "wars and rumors of wars" (Matt. 24: 6), "distress of nations with perplexity" (Luke 21: 25), and that these things have been recorded as forerunners of the second coming of the Prince of Peace, one might feel inclined to regard the warlike manifestations as a truer omen of what this poor sin-ridden world has to expect, while sin exists in it, than the reasonable arguments of the Peace Congress, which will never abolish sin, and hence cannot eliminate war.

When Klopstock had written his "Messiah," it was impossible to refuse him praise. The subject was a magnificent one, and it had been magnificently treated. All were agreed on this. But all did not read Klopstock, and many tried, but did not finish, reading his masterpiece. It was too grand, too exquisite to be real.

This thought suggested itself during the perusal of the press notices of what had been said and done at the Peace Congress. Universal peace, disarmament of nations, billions that are now wrung from unwilling taxpayers because of the presence or in anticipation of war to be henceforth devoted to education, public improvements, and the general diffusion of enlightenment and culture—all this is apt to stir up honest enthusiasm, because it sets up a goal that is worth striving for. Moreover, it is an undeniable fact that perhaps three-fourths of all the wars waged in this world have been wicked and wanton and foolish wars—wars that had nothing but the lust of power or mad revenge back of them as their governing motive, wars that could have been averted, if the belligerents had allowed time for the sober second thought to assert itself.

The Peace Congress was undoubtedly right in pointing out these facts, and in placing the utmost emphasis on them. They are old truths, but they deserve to be uttered again and again, just as we do not tire of preaching against sin and pointing out its awful consequences. Some of the speakers at the Congress drew eloquent word-pictures of the ravages of war, almost moving their audiences to tears. This, too, was proper in an orator, though there can be no more tear-compelling presentation made of the terrible woe of war than we have in the sober accounts of historians in all ages. No one, for instance, can read the history of that wicked war, the Thirty Years' War, without being stirred with indignation and resentment. The Congress produced no really new arguments under this head, but to have reiterated old facts and reasserted old truths is worth something too. Besides, an address like that of Dr. Green was of great value because of the wealth of detailed information which it offered on the movement for general peace and disarmament.

Perhaps the most prominent figure at the sessions of the Peace Congress was "the ironmaster." There is no doubt but that the millions which he has devoted to the cause of world-peace have given him a determining influence on the entire peace movement. He is altogether a unique factor in this movement. One is inclined to believe that with his rugged common sense he holds conservative views as regards the feasibility of the movement. He was without question the lionized member of the Fourth Peace Congress. In spite of his advanced years he entered into the work of the Congress with such zest that he fairly exhausted his physical strength by his oratorical effort at the opening session. There was a pardonable consciousness of his importance shown, when at a visit to the Carnegie Library he remarked that it was a better library than "I gave to London." It is open to debate, of course, whether the Carnegie millions might not be employed with more telling effect in other ways, for the purpose of alleviating real suffering in this world. But that rests necessarily with the owner of those millions.

We were startled, however, by the expression of certain religious and ethical views of Mr. Carnegie, which we had not supposed him to harbor. One of our afternoon dailies expressed surprise that in one of his public remarks he endorsed the ethics of Omar Khayyam, and thus put him "not only on the literary but also on the ethical map of the world." A prominent religious organ of St. Louis noted the expression of his "philosophy of life" made to local reporters, to whom he stated that his philosophy consisted in this, to have heaven on earth. He did not wish to die and go to heaven, and had no desire for any ticket to heaven issued by any person. Earth, he said, was heaven enough for him. If he were permitted to decide how long he might remain on earth, all his wishes would be fulfilled. The religious organ to which we refer added this editorial remark: "Poor man! He declares himself bankrupt. This earth is his heaven; yet he recognizes that he cannot remain in his heaven. Being seventy-eight years old, he will soon have to vacate his heaven. If Carnegie does not abandon his 'philosophy'—something we cordially wish he would—there will follow after his heaven on earth everlasting terror. Scripture cannot be broken, and Scripture says: 'He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him.' John 3: 36." The same paper also drew a parallel between Mr. Carnegie's religious views and those expressed by Mr. Morgan in his testament, which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published recently. The effect can be imagined.

THE DUKE OF CUMBERLAND

THE IMPERIAL WEDDING

THE THREE greatest kings of the earth, to whom six hundred million people owe allegiance, and a hundred lesser kings and princes, dukes and marquises, counts and barons and all their brilliant suites and military guards gathered in Berlin on May 23. Europe had not seen such a lavish display of "pomp and circumstance"—military, ceremonial and social—in a generation. And it was all for the marriage of a young girl, whose sweetness and simplicity have endeared her to all Germany, the Kaiser's only daughter—Prinzesschen, little princess, as she is lovingly called. The following day, May 24, four other princesses, Mary of England, Olga of Russia, Yolanda of Italy and Elizabeth of Roumania, were the bridesmaids of Princess Victoria Luise Adelheid Mathilde Charlotte, when she was married to Prince Ernest Agustus of Cumberland. All the world was the audience of this much-talked-of marriage. Interest has been aroused everywhere in the fact that this was a pure love match on the part of both the bride and bridegroom. During the last few months they have been the most photographed royalties of Europe and the camera has caught many unconventional poses, ranging all the way from arm-in-arm walks in the park to winter sports in the mountains. Then, too, the presence of the British and Russian emperors, Queen Mary of England, and the rulers of all the German kingdoms, principalities and duchies, added another note of human interest to the occasion. Fortune seems to have favored these young people in more ways than one, for their marriage closes a feud of some fifty years' standing between the Hohenzollerns and the Guelphs, caused by the setting aside of the claims of the bridegroom's father to the title of King of Hanover. More than that, the Kaiser, in giving a toast at the marriage feast, intimated that in the near future the bridegroom would become the ruler of the independent duchy of Brunswick.

The civil ceremony, attended only by the members of the families of the bride and bridegroom, took place at 4.30 in the Hall of Electors of the palace. At its conclusion a procession of the wedding guests was formed in line and proceeded to the royal chapel of the palace. It was led by the bride and bridegroom—the latter in the uniform of the Zieten Hussars. The princess wore a gown of cloth of silver, embroidered with real silver. Her train was of the same material as the dress and lined with ermine, and was carried by four bridesmaids, dressed in pale blue; and she wore the crown diamonds, forming a necklace and brooch, and the historic "Princess of Prussia" crown of large diamonds, resting on a base of purple velvet.

They were followed by the Kaiser with the Duchess of Cumberland, the Duke of Cumberland, with the Empress Auguste Victoria, then the Czar, King George V and Queen Mary of England. The crown prince and princess were followed by the younger sons of the Kaiser and their wives and over fifty other princes and princesses of the blood royal.

The empress was dressed in green satin with old silver embroidery, the robe being bordered with sable. She wore her famous five rows of pearls and collar of emeralds, and a diadem of diamonds.

The dress worn by Queen Mary of England was of cloth of gold, designed and made in India, with colored flowers worked in colored diamante embroidery. The train was of Irish lace, lined with cloth of gold, and having a deep embroidered border of leaf design. She wore a diamond crown, a collar formed of rows of diamonds, and a large necklace made of the lesser stars of Africa from the Cullinan diamond. In addition to these she wore the ribbon and splendid jeweled insignia of the Order of the Garter.

The German crown princess was in silver brocade, set off by the grand cordon of the Russian Catherine Order. The train was of pink velvet, embroidered in silver. She wore a diamond tiara, and the crown sapphires formed a necklace and brooch.

The simple religious ceremony of the Lutheran Church was performed by the Rev. Dr. Dryander, who had baptized the princess and also prepared her for her confirmation; and he also delivered the customary address of advice and admonition to the newly married couple. The ceremony ended at 5.30 and its conclusion was announced to the public by a salvo of thirty-six guns from the Wesen Battery of artillery.

The bride and bridegroom, with the Kaiser and Kaiserin and the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland, then proceeded to the White Hall, where they received the felicitations of the guests, who, in "passing the presence," walked through the hall in a stately procession, bowing low as they passed before the Emperor and Empress and the happy pair.

PRINCE ERNEST OF CUMBERLAND AND HIS BRIDE

Then came the wedding feast, for which the tables filled several banqueting halls. According to ancient custom, each dish was tasted by Prince Radolin before being served. In proposing the health of the bridal pair the Kaiser said: "My dear daughter, on this, the day that you leave us, I thank you from the bottom of my heart for the pleasure and joy you have always been to me and your mother. During a long time you have been a sunbeam in our house. It has been granted to you as to few to follow freely the inclination and the desires of your heart and receive the man you selected."

Addressing the bridegroom, he said: "My dear son: I confide to you our child. We both have the fullest confidence that you will love and care for her." After admonishing him to be grateful for the good things of life, he bade him to be also prepared to carry heavy burdens should they be placed on him, and then came the significant sentence: "It will surely ere long be vouchsafed to you both to serve and care for others," and the last sentence was: "May the task of serving others be the most beautiful of your life, and may the love of humanity warm both your hearts!"

At 8 P.M. the guests reassembled for the "torch dance," consisting of grand marches round the hall headed by twelve pages, arrayed in scarlet and gold, bearing thick candlesticks two feet long. The bridal pair joined the procession, each in turn leading two gentlemen and two ladies, respectively. At the beginning the bride led the Kaiser and the Duke of Cumberland, and Prince Ernest the Kaiserin and his mother. Later the princess led the Czar of All the Russias and King George V, while the bridegroom followed with Queen Mary and the crown princess.

The torch dance ended with the pages escorting the bridal pair to the nuptial chamber, where they changed the gorgeous wedding apparel for street attire before motoring to the depot for their railway journey to Hubertus Stock, the Kaiser's shooting box near Berlin, where they were to spend the first week of their honeymoon.

The distribution among the wedding guests of silk ribbons bearing the princess's initials and the date in gold letters—supposed to represent the bride's garter—brought the festivities to a close.

The total value of the wedding gifts was estimated to reach $2,000,000. They consisted largely of costly furniture. A Persian rug, a gift from the city of Berlin, had taken two years to make. The Kaiser gave his daughter a diadem and necklace of pearls, while the Kaiserin fitted her out with a complete wardrobe from her private purse, and gave her also a diamond tiara. The bridegroom's gift was a gigantic brooch of emeralds and pearls, and Dowager Queen Alexandra of England sent a similar ornament; while the Czar gave a rare malachite bowl, and the Emperor of Austria a tiara of diamonds.

Only one utterance of direct political import went forth to the world from the palace when the three greatest living monarchs met together. At a luncheon King George V said that it was the great object of his life to preserve peace among the nations as it had been that of his father, King Edward VII.

At the beginning of the week the Kaiser pardoned two English officers and one civilian serving sentences in German fortresses on charges of espionage.

General Notes

—The Woman's Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church is arranging for a memorial to the late Margaret Sangster, which will take the form of a gymnasium for the Ferris Seminary at Yokohama, Japan.

—On May 20, the United Presbyterian Assembly, in session at Atlanta, Ga., adopted a resolution, introduced by Professor John A. Wilson, who occupies the chair of Church History in the Pittsburg Theological Seminary, calling upon the President to forbid teachers in government schools to wear religious garb of any kind whatsoever.

—On May 18, Emperor Yoshihito, of Japan, took cold at a military parade in Tokyo, which developed into pneumonia. When the news reached Washington, four days later, President Wilson cabled the following to his majesty: "Reports received through press agencies are current to the effect that your majesty is indisposed. I have heard these reports with sorrow and with great concern. Should they prove to be true I desire to offer to your majesty for myself and for the government and people of the United States the assurances of my sincere sympathy and to express the ardent hope that your illness may prove to be of brief duration and your recovery rapid and complete." A prompt reply came in the name of the emperor: "People touched by your kind message inquiring after my indisposition. I express my sincere thanks to yourself, and the government and people of the United States." A day or two afterwards the emperor was reported to be out of danger.

The World's Hope

TO THE thoughtful student of events, who distinguishes between clamor and real progress, there must come the conviction that, even in these boisterous, unsettled days, so filled with war, worldliness and wickedness, humanity is marching onward, divinely guided along the right track. This view was empl asized in a very notable way by Mr. Bryan. our Secretary of State, in a recent address delivered in Chicago, the speaker laying down as a basis the threefold proposition of an advance in intelligence, in morals and in the science of government. China, India, Africa, Japan, the Philippines, Spain and Portugal have all experienced, some in greater, others in lesser degree, the awakening power of education. In moral advancement, we need only look at the great change in the attitude of men to-day toward the Bible and religion. Over a million in adult Bible classes in our own land within a decade; benevolent and altruistic effort everywhere spreading; conscience striking deep into business and politics; official honor and uprightness demanded more than ever before—these and many other indications are to be regarded as forerunners of a new and better era.

If we could only understand God's times and seasons—which are hidden from us by his wisdom, but regulated with unfailing precision—we would be wise indeed! If to the divine mind duration and achievement are one and the same; if the fruitless years may be less than days and the full years more than centuries, then, as we look upon the record of achievement of the Christian Church in the last few decades, we may be justified in believing that the world is marching on more quickly than before. The deep stirring of the masses in the desire for better conditions of life; the spread of the Gospel; the growing tendency to international fraternization on social and spiritual lines; the ever-increasing hope in men's hearts for the dawn of world-peace—these are "signs of the times" not to be overlooked. We are not to look for the world's conversion through any human effort—that must be accomplished by divine power; but to the church belongs the responsibility of giving the whole Gospel message to all men. Is it living up fully to that responsibility? Are we striving with all our energies and resources to carry out the great task to which Christ dedicated his church? If we are slack in our efforts at world-evangelization, may not we be delaying the fulfilment of the divine programme, which is not to be carried out until all is ready and our whole duty is done? If our Lord were again to visit the earth for a season, would he find that his church and his people had faithfully performed their task in preparation for his final coming? Would he find faith in the seminaries of learning? Would he look in vain for that unity of Christian forces which he has the right to expect? Much that is good he would find unquestionably; but what of the task he gave each and all of us to do, and which has been lingering incomplete? If the Christian men and women of America were each to ask of themselves these questions individually, what would their answer be?

These are the thoughts that must arise in the minds of many earnest Christians who are now laboring and praying for the advancement of the Kingdom—thoughts that cannot and should not be repressed. They were the thoughts of the early church; they should be the inspiration of the church to-day. Only when we have done all of our duty and have witnessed for Christ "unto the uttermost parts of the earth" can we claim the right to look for the redemption of that glorious pledge which so long has been the desire of the Christian world.

The Episcopal Controversy

IN THE protracted controversy over the proposed change of name in the Protestant Episcopal Church, a focal point was reached when the Diocesan Convention of Central New York, sitting at Utica, on May 28, decided to postpone indefinitely any action on the proposed change, which was first suggested by the Des Moines diocese over a year ago. They found that the controversy had engendered much bitter feeling, threatening a serious split in the church. It was the pastor of Trinity, New York, who, by his able defense of the old name, turned the tide against a change. There was brought to light, among the archives of Trinity parish, the charter of that corporation granted by King William in 1697. In that historic document it is set forth that the charter is given for the purpose of "settling a ministry and raising a maintenance for them in the city of New York, . . . and there shall be called, inducted and established a good sufficient Protestant minister to officiate and have the care of souls within our said city of New York." Further, this minister is bound to preach and officiate "in the public worship and service of God according to the rites and ceremonies of our Protestant Church of England, established by our laws." The corporate name of the parish is designated as "The Rector and Inhabitants in Communion of the Protestant Church of England in the State of New York." In 1814 the New York legislature passed an act changing the title to Trinity Church, but not separating it from the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State. It is quite clear that those good old-fashioned churchmen held the name "Protestant" in greater esteem and veneration than some of their descendants do to-day, and that any suggestion of abandoning a name which stood for something far above mere sentiment, would have been deemed almost a sacrilege.

Is It the Tower of Babel?

FROM Babylonia, where a party of investigators, under the auspices of the Institute of France, have been conducting excavations near the ruins of the ancient city of Kis (near the Euphrates River and about eighty miles north of Bagdad), comes a very remarkable report. These men, in the course of their researches, uncovered an immense palace, resembling royal residences that have been disclosed in other parts of ancient Babylonia. In a vast courtyard near this palace, which was heaped high with mounds of débris, they unearthed the ruins of a tower, which, according to inscriptions found upon it, was called "The Temple of the Foundation of Heaven and Earth," and which was dedicated to the honor of the god Zamana. Various pieces of statuary found in the ruins seem to warrant the conclusion that the tower itself might have been constructed during the reign of Hammurabi, about 2100 B.C. There have been several so-called identifications of Babel. One of these related to the ruin of a tower at Borsippa (Birs-Nimrud) which the Babylonians called the "House of Eternity"; another was the temple, E-Sag-illa, which has now disappeared and which was a huge, storied tower, bearing the appellation E-timin-an-ki ("House of the Foundation Stone of Heaven and Earth"). The similarity of inscriptions between the latter and the new found tower at Kis suggests the possibility of natural mistake. Hammurabi is also said to hav built a temple, also near Kis, "whose top he carrie up as high as heaven." Thus, the region seems t have been "a complex of towers and sanctuaries making the positive determination of the Scriptur Babel a matter of grave difficulty. Any one Bab lonian or Chaldean temple is a type of all the other

Colonel Roosevelt's Courage

ONE of the ancient writers tells of the temple o Rumor, which hangs midway in air, its wal of brass, its windows ever wide and the whole edi fice a sounding shell, which repeats with exag gerated reverberation the noises that ascend fro below. In our own day, the real temple of Rumo is the sensational newspaper, which catches up an multiplies a thousandfold every word of detraction every slanderous innuendo, and scatters then abroad promiscuously. Occasionally, the slander mongering journal gets a well-deserved jolt, whe some public man of courage and spirit compels it t recognize the distinction between legitimate criti cism and libel. This is what Colonel Roosevelt i doing in his prosecution of the Michigan edito whose paper accused him of excessive drinking. I bringing him sharply to book, the ex-President i rendering a substantial public service. Any case that is built on mere gossip and rumor, which i circulated with the obvious design of detraction deserves to be exposed and penalized. It is unfor tunately true that the aspersion of men prominent in public life has become a part of the stock-in-trade of certain newspapers. Possibly Mr. Roosevelt's plucky battle may set a new precedent, which wil have the effect of reducing this evil hereafter.

Ghastly Sport

THAT prizefighting is a relic of barbarism and should be legislated out of existence is brought home to the average mind with intensified conviction by the killing of Luther McCarty at Calgary, Alberta, recently. A champion in full health enters the roped arena and a few moments later is dead of a neck-breaking blow, received in what the professionals denominate a "fair fight." This is the eleventh instance in recent years in which a fistic encounter has ended in manslaughter. Such occurrences cause only a passing thrill; they rarely arouse sufficient indignation to make them an object of prohibitive legislation, and the mankiller usually gets off with a nominal punishment. And we call ourselves civilized and humane; although when the old savage that is hidden in most men comes to the surface in a modern prize ring mob, one would hardly suspect that it belonged to the twentieth century.

Winning China Through the Children

WE ARE urged by our missionary friends in China to remind our readers at this season of the twelve hundred little famine orphans who for several years past have been provided for at the mission schools through the generosity of CHRISTIAN HERALD friends. This has been a work of pure Christian love, and it is missionary service of the very highest order. Bishop William Taylor, one of the grandest Americans who ever entered a foreign mission field, used to say that if any heathen land was ever to be taken for Christ, we must begin with the children. China is undergoing a gigantic transformation, political, economic, social and spiritual. She is breaking away from her pagan faith and her idols and calling on us for the Gospel. Here is an opportunity which no one who believes in the carrying out of the Great Commission should slight. We would wish every reader of this journal to have a share in China's spiritual redemption, and it is an excellent plan to begin with the Christian training of her little ones. Our orphun training work in India has produced many pastors, evangelists, colporteurs, Bible-women and Christian workers, in addition to hundreds of self-supporting godly men and women engaged in other callings. Funds are needed now for the support of the Chinese orphans for the next twelve months, and we extend a cordial invitation to all who read these lines to send a gift for that purpose to The China Orphan Fund, care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. "Whosoever hath done it to the least of these little ones, hath done it unto Me."

Cuba's New President Inaugurated

NOT in ten years had there been such a gala day in Havana and Cuba generally as the twentieth of May, which witnessed the inauguration of General Mario G. Menocal as president of that republic. Secretary of State Enguily, in a handsome carriage and escorted by mounted guards, left the palace for the humble home of General Menocal in the Vedado to bring him in to the palace. Crowds cheered all along the route. Women from the balconies of their houses threw down showers of flowers into the carriage, and the streets were literally carpeted with roses as a mark of popular affection. The oath of office was administered in the Red Room of the palace, and a single gun from Cabañas Fortress proclaimed the hour. Then, accompanied by General José Miguel Gomez, the retiring president, President Menocal passed out upon the balcony overlooking the Plaza de Armas. The president's address was short, declaring that he would devote all his energies to giving the country a clean business administration, which will foster the industries of the land, develop its splendid resources, welcome the coming of foreign capital and immigration and maintain friendly relations, especially with the United States. After his inauguration, President Menocal received the American special mission, composed of Dudley Field Malone, General Enoch H. Crowder and Edward Bell, and the members of the American legation. General Menocal was born in Jagüey Grande, Matanzas Province, in 1866. His family removed to the United States soon after and he was educated in the Military College at Washington and then at Cornell University, where he graduated as a civil engineer. He went with his uncle, Aniceto Menocal, chief of the engineering staff which made the survey of the Nicaragua canal and worked with him. At Santa Cruz he joined the revolutionary forces as a private and rose to a division general. The inauguration, it is expected, will usher in a new era of national thrift and happiness for which the people of our country, as well as those of Cuba, will rejoice. The sovereigns amongst the Hebrews were inaugurated with considerable pomp and popular enthusiasm. Elisha sent one of the sons of the prophets to perform the most important function in the inaugural of Jehu the king.

Hagenbeck Filled Difficult Contract

KARL HAGENBACK, who died recently, was the most renowned animal collector and dealer in the world. He supplied nearly all the menageries and zoos in three continents. He kept his animals in a large park at Stellingen near Hamburg. During his last years he did not go far from home, and took no risks from wild animals. In 1905 the German Government asked him if he would furnish one thousand dromedaries, provide saddles for each, and transport them thousands of miles from East Africa to German Southwest Africa, and have the first shipment of three hundred beasts ready in three months. He said that he could. He sent his brother and other trusty men to do the buying and set sail in a vessel he had chartered and fitted up especially for the purpose. He could not find any saddle to suit him, so he invented one and had the saddlers of Hamburg make them. He had his first shipment delivered in three months, and then the rest of the thousand were furnished. The German Government was so pleased with the animals, their quality, and the speed of their delivery, that it took another thousand of them from him. In the business engagements of life, in the material, mental and spiritual realm, it is necessary to be prompt, accurate and reliable. The animal dealers' expedition in filling the government order reminds us of David's haste because he had business for the government.

For I have neither brought my sword nor my weapons with me, because the king's business required haste. (I Sam. 21: 8.)

Declares Cross a Failure

EVERY now and then some heretical minister has to break out in a sensational assault upon the cardinal doctrines of the Bible. The last is the denial of the atonement by the Rev. Edward Cummings of the South Congregational Church of Boston made in an address before the Free Religious Association in Boston, when his name was placed on the program with four other speakers representing three denominations having as the subject of the session "A Religious Program for To-day." We hope that no injustice has been wrought by misquotation in the report sent out quite generally to the daily papers. According to report he says: "The religion of the cross is a failure. I believe the Christian world is tired of it. The cross was a great mistake, a woeful tragedy. How much better it would have been if the Master could have gone on unfolding truth to the world and clearing the old doubts and misconceptions which have given the world such endless difficulty!" The religion of the cross is not a failure, but every other thing that is employed as a substitute for it is. To cut the cross out of Christianity would be to cut the heart out of it. It would be to tear down nine out of ten churches, Sunday schools, Young Men's Christian Associations, colleges, and institutions of beneficence, the offspring of the church in this country. No! the Christian world is not tired of the cross; it is its greatest pride voiced in the words of the apostle:

God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ. (Gal. 6: 14.)

Pugilist Killed in Ring

LUTHER McCARTY, the white heavyweight champion fighter of the world, had his neck broken in the prize-ring at Calgary, Canada, the other day by a blow on the jaw delivered by Arthur Pelkey. The match was being fought in violation of the law, and the man responsible for the death is being held for trial, as are also two or three managers of the contest. It is said that the tragedy will put an end to all illegal prize-ring contests. The next day after McCarty's death, Tommy Burns's prize-fight arena, in which the tragedy occurred, was burned to the ground, it is thought by some one out of revenge. Less than twenty-four hours after McCarty's death at Calgary, Frank Carbone, a young student in the pugilist game, died from injuries received in a sparring match a few nights before. This prize-fight business is a shame and a crime. It is the slugging of brutes to satisfy diabolical tastes. It has been pretty nearly done away with. Every vestige of it must be uprooted. No polite boxing matches should be allowed as the entering of the thin edge of this wedge of crime. The deaths of McCarty and Carbone, though not intended, were murders and in disobedience to the law of God and man.

Thou shalt not kill. (Ex. 20: 13.)

Restored Daughter, Secures Fortune

A TRUE story, stranger than any fiction, is told of the restoration of a daughter of wealth and culture from a life of shame to her parents by a Canadian merchant and of the gift of $2,000,000 to him by a provision of the thankful father's will. David S. Kidd, superintendent of the Protestant House of Refuge in Montreal, then a tea merchant in Toronto, went to Chicago in 1907 to find his brother, whom he had not seen for twenty years. He went to the large store where he expected to find him, but failed to do so. He walked across the street into what he supposed to be a real estate office. It was not; men and women were in the room. One beautiful girl ran up to him and asked him to buy a drink. He said he would not, and taking a Bible from his pocket he read to her the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke and emphasized the affection of women for the risen Lord. He then begged her to leave the place and go home to her parents. She told him her father was one of the leading business men of Pittsburg, and that she had one of the sweetest homes on the earth to return to. Kidd went out and over the way to a restaurant for his luncheon, and to his surprise this girl came in and sat down at the same table opposite to him, and as the two were alone she opened her heart to him and said she was homesick for father and mother and for the right. He encouraged her and offered a silent prayer for her. She went back home to her parents, who were wild with joy at her return, and told them of the good man who had persuaded her to return, and gave them the name and address of her benefactor. This was in April, 1907. In September of the same year her father, who was Mr. Byrne, wrote Kidd a letter, thanking him, and saying that he intended to reward him in some substantial way. The girl, Lucy Byrne, died in 1908, and her father soon followed her. In the will $425,000 was left outright to Kidd, and another $1,544,500 on the condition that he change his name from Kidd to Byrne. Besides, $580,000 was left for a Byrne Memorial Home and $1,000,000 more for its endowment. The estate was worth about $10,000,000. Kidd, after a great deal of trouble and delay, involving a trip to Australia to secure the proper authority, had his name changed to Byrne and is just entering into the possession of his great fortune. Kidd had a fortune greater than the money left him in his love for God and his fellow men, and in the salvation of a precious soul from a life of sin. And Byrne had a wealth above his millions in his love for his daughter and in his gratitude for her return to him and to a life of virtue and piety. This love for his wayward girl reminds us of Christ's treatment of the unfortunate woman whose death by stoning the law required.

Go, and sin no more. (John 8: 11.)

NORTHFIELD'S THIRTY-FIRST SUMMEI

THE visitor to Northfield this summer finds that the administrative offices of the Northfield Schools and Summer Conferences are no longer located in scattered and cramped quarters, but are comfortably housed in a beautiful new building, Kenarden Hall, the gift of Mrs. John S. Kennedy, of New York City. Another important change which will add greatly to the capacity and comfort of the conference grounds is the complete renovation of Marquand Hall, which has housed thousands during the past thirty years. Guests at Marquand and tenters who go there for meals will particularly appreciate the enlarged dining-room, the newly equipped kitchen, and the shower baths and up-to-date plumbing throughout the house.

There are some things that do not change at Northfield. The same hills stand guard, inviting a climb; the Connecticut River still winds down through its green meadows, calling the water-lover to boat or swim; the same shady country roads suggest a tramp or a drive. Best of all, the same old spirit of consecrated service is there, the same old fellowship in the deeper and more abiding interests of life, and an inspiring presentation of the truths of the Christian life by speakers of world-wide renown.

Through all the spring the campus has thronged with the six hundred girl students at Northfield Seminary. But on June 10 came the last day of the concerts and receptions of commencement week, and now the girls have scattered to their homes to give place to the hundreds of visitors who go to Northfield to attend the summer conferences.

This year the list of conference speakers includes a large number of favorites, some of whom have not been at Northfield for several years.

Already the list is practically complete, and it includes many names of men of international fame. Among them are Rev. J. Stuart Holden, London, England; Rev. John A. Hutton, Edinburgh, S land; Dr. George R. Stuart, Knoxville, Tenn.; A. T. Robertson, Louisville, Ky.; Dr. Robert Speer, New York City; Rev. John Daniel Jo Bournemouth, England; Rev. KENARDEN HALL, NORTHFIELD'S NEW ADMINISTRATION BUILDING

THE GRADUATING GOWN

BY HAROLD WILLIAM FIFERLIK

A Story Complete in This Issue

THE cottage of Miss Ellen Parks nestled cozily among the shadowy clumps of rose bushes and bridal wreath that grew close about it. In the darkness it seemed almost like a small, contented white fowl of some sort. The light from the window of the sitting-room revealed the tangle of red rambler that climbed the porch and the net of straight white strings for the morning glories that had just begun to reach upward.

The girl at the gate stopped and stood still for an instant with her hand on the latch. "Isn't it a pretty little place?" she said, with a catch in her voice. "It's like a home—or something. I never noticed before."

She went in and up the path and waited a moment on the porch. Then she rapped.

Miss Parks answered the summons. In some way Miss Parks's plump, neat figure seemed to belong to the house, to be of a piece with it. Her eyes lighted behind their gold-rimmed spectacles as she caught sight of her caller.

"Why, Rhoda Marsh," she cried hospitably, "I'm just as glad as I can be to see you! I was only this minute wishin' somebody'd come in. I declare, sometimes it seems as if I get downright hungry to have folks to talk to, and to-day's been one of the times. It gets so quiet when I'm here alone that I just get nervous." She laughed indulgently. "I guess I ain't gettin' any younger as I grow older, Rhoda. Come right in. How's Mis' Taylor?"

"She's well," the girl answered hastily. "But I can't stay. I just came on an errand. I must go back."

"You come right in here," Miss Parks repeated firmly. "You can sit a few minutes, anyway. I won't hear to any nonsense."

In a moment the girl found herself being guided into the little sitting-room. It was a comfortable room, with its bright wallpaper, its clean, worn carpet, its well-kept furniture, and its hanging lamp with the glass prisms dangling from the shade. She sat down in a cushioned rocker, and her hostess drew up a chair opposite and regarded her across the broad center-table.

"Why, Rhoda, ain't you well? You look sort of played out or something."

The girl sat erect quickly, and clasped her hands in her lap. She smiled. "No, no," she said, "I'm all right. I could hardly wait to get here; that's all. I ran some of the way. Miss Parks, Mrs. Taylor sent me to ask you if you could come to-morrow."

Miss Parks grew sober. She paused. "Well now," she said slowly, "I don't see how I can to-morrow very well, Rhoda. I've been gettin' so kind of lonesome and fidgety that I've planned to go down to Alton to stay two or three days. I s'pose I could put it off, though."

The girl's face fell. Her companion did not see the look of bitter disappointment in her eyes.

"I've been plannin' on gettin' me a new carpet and maybe a chair or two for this sittin'-room," Miss Parks went on. "It's seemed as if it's needed brightenin' up of some kind lately. I've got it into my head that some new fixin's would do it, maybe, and I've been savin' a little to get 'em. It don't do to have the same things too long, I guess; or probably it's just an old maid notion. What is it Mis' Taylor's calculatin' to have done, Rhoda?"

The girl drew a deep breath. "It's a dress, Miss Parks, a dress for me. It's my graduatin' dress."

The slight cloud fled from Miss Parks's face. "Rhoda Marsh," she cried, "why didn't you say so in the first place! Land sakes, I'd forgotten all about it! Why, any one could have told you I can't ever keep away from such work! It'll do me more good than a month of visitin' or buyin' fifty chairs! You ought to have known how I love to fuss with pretty things, Rhoda!"

The girl smiled brightly. "But I 'most know I won't have anything so very pretty, Miss Parks," she said. "Mrs. Taylor only told me to ask you to come; she said she'd have a slip fixed over and she'd see about the dress after you got there. Oh, I was so afraid she'd think she couldn't let me have anything at all—and it seemed as if I just had to. But now I am going to have a dress!"

Miss Parks beamed delightedly. "And it will be pretty, Rhoda; I know it will. Graduatin' things are just bound to be. My, it don't seem as if you could be goin' to graduate, though, does it? Why, it wasn't a week ago that you was a little trick. But le's see; you come to Mis' Taylor's when you was twelve. Rhoda Marsh, you're sixteen! And now you're goin' to stay right on with Mis' Taylor, I s'pose, and—"

"No," the girl said quickly. "I'm going back to Uncle Max's."

"Rhoda! Why, what on earth for?"

"I—I didn't know it till yesterday, Miss Parks. Then Mrs. Taylor told me. She said she couldn't afford to keep me any more now that I wasn't going to be in school and she'd have to pay me." The girl stopped. "But I—I don't care," she hurried on. "I wanted to graduate, and I'm going to. I—I'll be big enough to look out for myself pretty soon, I guess."

"Rhoda, you're nothing but a baby," Miss Parks said indignantly. "What can Mis' Taylor be thinkin' of?"

"She—couldn't afford it, she said. . . . But I am going to graduate! I guess I can stand the rest." The girl rose abruptly. "I'll have to g Mrs. Taylor told me to come right back; it's u stairs sweeping day to-morrow."

"How many children has your Uncle Max go Rhoda?"

"He—he's got six. I— Well, good night, Mis Parks."

Miss Parks got up quickly and came and patte her shoulder. "Rhoda, I'm awfully sorry; I'm jus as sorry as I can be. I wish I could do something.

"Oh, you can. You're going to make the dres I know it'll just need everything you can do."

Suddenly Miss Parks bent and kissed her cheek "It'll be just the prettiest graduatin' gown tha ever was in Elmdale, Rhoda," she promised. "Yo just wait and see if it ain't."

The girl did not reply. They went to the doo together.

"You're awfully good to me, Miss Parks."

Miss Parks smiled. "I wish I could be better Rhoda. And I declare, I'm just as anxious to begi on that dress as you are to have me. If you ain' spry, I'll be there before you're up, I believe."

She stood in the doorway and watched the girl g down the path. Long after Rhoda had disappeare in the shadow of the maples that lined the sidewalk she stood there with an absent frown on her face Then she closed the door and went thoughtfully back to the quiet sitting-room.

Rhoda Marsh, hurrying homeward, was striving bravely to keep before her the picture of commence ment day. She felt that she must keep it there. By means of it alone could she nerve herself to look into the future that had so suddenly been opened to her the night before. Resolutely she summoned up the vision, as she had dreamed it a hundred times— the little Congregational church filled with people and fragrant with roses and garden flowers, the decorous group of trustees, the class soberly assembled in the front pews, and herself for once garbed like them, for once undistinguishable from them.

"Maybe if I've got that to remember, I can do the rest," she whispered. "I—I know I won't be afraid to try, anyway."

When she reached the tall, gaunt, angular Job Taylor house, she went around to the kitchen door and climbed the steps. As she hung up her hat, a woman's shrill voice came down the back stairs.

"Rho—die!"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Have you been to Miss Parks's?"

"Yes. She said she could come. She'll be here early."

"All right. Now come up here. I'm in the attic."

The girl felt herself turn strangely cold. A

THE BUSINESS OF BEING TACTFUL

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

"WHENEVER I open my mouth I put my foot in it!" announced the tiny blonde girl, decisively; and in the general laugh that followed her rather proper assertion she only ruefully shook her head and smiled. "I mean it," she went on, "I mean it — dreadfully! When I go out calling, and there is no subject that I should avoid, I always stumble into it. If, even in fun, I say something about a stranger that is disrespectful or cattish, why, it always happens to be some relative of her that I am talking to. I don't know what to think, girls, but I guess that I was born unlucky."

"Don't worry about that," said one of the other girls who was placidly eating fudge, "it really shouldn't matter to you!"

But it should matter to you, girls, every one of you. For the hurting of people's feelings by saying the wrong thing is a very large matter indeed.

Some people seem to be born tactful, and others acquire tact with difficulty. But some poor unfortunates die without ever having known the softening influence of the right word at the right time.

I had my first little lesson in tact when I was a very tiny girl. It was Christmas morning, and I was displaying my new doll (Christmas always meant a doll to me), to my three little playmates who had dropped in with their own newly acquired treasures. Two of the little girls were very rich, and they displayed beautiful Parisian models with wonderfully shaped faces and real hair; my doll was not nearly as pretty in itself, but it was a beautiful baby dressed in snowy clothing made as only my mother could make all dresses. The third little girl came from a family that was not at all well off. Every penny was counted, as there were many mouths to fill, and yet she too had a new doll. It was a rag baby of the kind that may be made at home from a ten-cent linen pattern.

The richest little girl started things. She held her doll up high, triumphantly.

"See," she cried, "my dolly is nicer than yours, much nicer! Why, she can say 'mamma' like a real live person, and she opens and shuts her eyes!"

My mind was full to overflowing with thoughts of the embroidered petticoats and silk bootees that clothed my baby doll; and I was about to speak when I noticed a round glassy tear gathering on the lashes of the poor little girl, as she held her rag baby tightly to her breast. An awful thought struck me and my eyes grew round as I looked. Could it be that my little friend did not like her doll? I held my breath and waited for the storm. But the other rich child saved the situation.

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

"What a dear dollie!" she cried, putting her own down on a nearby chair. "Let me hold her! She's so soft and nice when you love her, just like a real baby!"

And in the depths of my very young heart, I wished I had been the one to make that speech.

I am going to take the risk of telling you a story that has become almost threadbare from many repetitions. You have probably all heard about the man who committed suicide by hanging himself in the attic of his home. His wife was, of course, stricken with grief, and kind neighbors came in to sympathize with her. One woman who called had a talent for saying the wrong thing, and as she was fully aware of the fact, she began desperately to hunt around for something safe to say.

"Isn't the rain awful?" she said.

"Terrible," answered the widow mournfully; "I don't know how the washing will ever get dry!"

"Oh! don't worry about that," returned her tactless comforter, "you have a perfectly lovely attic to hang things in."

Of course this story is overdrawn, yet I have known people, and I imagine you have too, matter-of-fact, tactless people, who would have said the very same thing or something equally impossible under those circumstances.

But there are many less significant "breaks" that are very common. Who has never mentioned the fatal words "red hair" to a girl who is sensitive about her auburn locks? I love that color of hair myself, and yet I, too, am among the thoughtless number. Who has never remarked in the hearing of a favorite teacher that she hates school?

There are so many, many "don'ts" that a tactful person must remember. Never say to the girl who has only one new dress a year, that that dress is unbecoming. Its colors may clash wildly, and it may take all the natural charm from its wearer, and yet as long as it must be worn, why not smother the criticism? When a girl dislikes her freckles, or her straight hair, or the shape of her nose, always carefully avoid the subject; for a girl, particularly a very young one, often lies awake half the night going over in her tired little brain some unkind thought or tactless word too hastily expressed.

I once heard an elderly man speak of a boy who had offered him a seat in a trolley car:

"Why," he told me, almost in tears, "that boy (he wasn't more than eighteen) got up and touched my arm. 'Here,' he said, 'take my seat. You need it more than I do.'"

The action was kind, but tactless. If the young man had only said:

"Won't you take my seat, sir? I leave the car very soon," it would have been much more thankfully accepted, and the old man would have been much happier.

In a school I once attended the most popular girl was the most tactful one. As far as I know only one girl disliked her. That girl was spiteful, cross, and therefore not very well liked. Do you know what she used to call our idol? A hypocrite. The words bothered me not a little, and I spoke to my chum about it, but she answered me in her thoughtful little way:

"Well, I guess that maybe Betty is a hypocrite, if being a hypocrite means saying little kind things based on small pretexts and leaving unsaid the unkind things no matter how good a reason there is for saying them; but she's a mighty comfortable person to have around. I wish that the world was full of such hypocrites!"

Girls, tact is the oil that makes the wheels of our great social and industrial and business worlds run smoothly. I want you all to have it. Be tactful in your homes as well as in school or in your daily life. When mother and grandmother are in the room with you and your friends, include them in your conversation. It is mighty unkind to let a person, particularly one who is older than you, think that you do not care to interest her in your little affairs. If you dislike people do not say things point blank that you know will annoy them. It is much better to say nothing. Remember that you should "do unto others as you would have others do unto you."

When you say the wrong thing don't regret it,
And cry in your sorrow and pain;
But clench your hands tight, and with all of your might,
Think: "I never will say that again!"

THE GRADUATING GOWN

premonition of disaster came over her. As she mounted the stairs, her heart began to pound. She paused at the first landing, and again at the top. She was trembling.

Before a high old wardrobe in the stuffy garret Mrs. Job Taylor sat on a broken chair with a lamp beside her on the floor. Her straight, spare back was toward the stairway, but piled around her was a varied assortment of old garments—skirts, coats, hats, and shoes. She was inspecting something.

Rhoda came forward slowly. "What is it, Mrs. Taylor?"

Mrs. Taylor turned her head briskly. "Rhodie, I just wanted to show you what I've found. I'm real pleased over it. I did think I'd have to go and buy something, and then I remembered this. You step right around here where you can see."

Like one going into the presence of some dreaded thing Rhoda advanced. Her employer rose. The girl stopped. With one energetic flirt the woman shook out the object she held. There was a gasp of dismay.

"There!" exclaimed Mrs. Taylor delightedly. "Now ain't that about the finest piece of luck anybody ever heard of?"

Rhoda stared at the object in a sort of dumb fascination. It was a gown, a gown of a limp, worn dimity that had once been white, with a pattern of small flowers, but had faded till the flowers were gone and the ground would never be quite white again. A thousand disordered ruffles adorned the skirt, and the plaits and tucks and little fulnesses of the waist were a bewilderment to the eye. It hung from its owner's hands like the weary ghost of all the gowns since time began.

"Yes, sir," Mrs. Taylor went on, eyeing it, "it'll be just the thing. There's lots of it, and Miss Parks is real handy at contrivin'. It'll be just a wonderful savin'."

The girl gulped. She seemed to have gone pale in the lamplight. "Mrs. Taylor," she faltered, "am—am I goin' to graduate in that?"

Mrs. Taylor started. For the first time she took her eyes from the gown and fixed them on her companion. "Rhoda Marsh," she cried, "what ails you? Certainly you are!"

The girl stood still, as if held by a spell of some kind. She was looking at the gown again.

Mrs. Taylor's thin lips tightened. "No one would ever know but what it was regular white goods," she declared. "Miss Parks will get you a real handsome dress out of it. It'll look just fine when it's made up. I know perfectly well what I'm talkin' about, Rhodie."

"Mrs. Taylor!" cried Rhoda. She shook herself, and then a light of frantic fear flashed up in her eyes. "Mrs. Taylor, I wanted a new dress! I want one like the other girls will have! You as much as said I might! I've got to! It needn't be expensive. I don't want a lot, Mrs. Taylor; you know I don't." She choked. "But I've got to have one! You don't understand, Mrs. Taylor—you—"

"Rhoda Marsh!" Mrs. Taylor exclaimed, aghast. For an instant she was too overcome to say more. "You stop such talk! You ought to be ashamed! Ain't you goin' to have a dress? Ain't I—"

"Mrs. Taylor, just look at it!"

"Wait till it's made up, I tell you! It's white and thin; it's just the right thing."

"Mrs. Taylor, I've earned—"

"That'll do! You've earned! What have you earned that you haven't had, I'd like to know? Do you think I can go and buy a great lot of truck just for nothing?"

"Mrs. Taylor—"

"I won't listen to another word! But I declare, if I ever take another young one to board and school for what housework they can do, I'll miss my guess! No, no; I've heard enough! Rhodie Marsh, you go straight downstairs. I hope you'll come to your senses before mornin'."

Without a word the girl turned and obeyed. She seemed scarcely to realize what she was doing. Dumbly she made her way to her own room, went in, and closed the door. She undressed and got into bed in the dark. With eyes tight shut and hands clenched she lay there barely breathing.

After a while she began to think. There was no vision now. It was gone, and she was face to face with a future that stood out bare and wretched, unrelieved by the softening influence of happy memories. It was all there; its details seemed even clearer than those of the vision had ever been. There was the dreary, poverty-ridden, unfruitful farm that, despite Uncle Max's utmost efforts, was always unable to meet the innumerable heavy demands upon it. She well knew what a burden one added presence would be. Still she could have met the weariness, and the loneliness. But now—

"I can't," she moaned. "I can't, I can't."

But gradually the details became dimmer. Only a great, dull ache remained, an ache that left her powerless to cry out or protest. It was the ache of the forsaken, the miserable, of those for whom there seems to be no place.

No relief came with the morning. The light seemed almost mocking. For a time she lay still in a sort of apathy of misery. Then she got up in a mechanical, unthinking way, dressed herself, and went down to the kitchen. Mrs. Taylor regarded her as with outraged patience.

"I want this nonsense stopped, Rhodie Marsh," she said sternly. "There ain't one bit of sense to your actin' so like a martyr."

It was hardly eight o'clock and Rhoda was just finishing the breakfast dishes at the sink when there came a brisk ring at the front doorbell. Mrs. Taylor herself answered it, and then Miss Parks's cheery greeting was wafted through the house.

"Good mornin', Mis' Taylor. I allowed to get here early. I know just how hard it is for young folks to wait in any such matter."

"Yes, yes," Mrs. Taylor responded; "Rhodie's set great store by her graduatin'. I'll have you step right into the sittin'-room, Miss Parks. I've got the sewin'-machine and work-table drawed in there by the window. I'll take your things so's't you won't have to lose any time."

Rhoda heard them enter the sitting-room.

CHICAGO'S BEST-KNOWN MISSION

THE Pacific Garden Mission in Chicago, where for over thirty-two years Harry Monroe has been performing miracles of salvation with the human wreckage that drifts within his reach, took its name from a beer-hall—but in the years that mission workers have taken the place of bartenders sufficient tears of penitence have fallen upon its one-time beer-soaked floors to wash away all memories of its former use. In its unregenerate days the "Pacific Garden" was a famous hangout for crooked men of all kinds. Its big sign was better known to thousands of drifting derelicts than that of the Sherman House—Chicago's oldest hostelry. Accordingly, it was perhaps little less than an inspiration which possessed the new owner of the property, George R. Clark, when the beer-hall moved away, to insert the word "Mission" on the old sign and turn the room into a place for the saving of souls. And now the fame of the Pacific Garden Mission has gone from coast to coast and is known to mission workers throughout the world.

One of the earliest fruits of the Pacific Garden Mission was the conversion of Harry Monroe. The mission was only three or four years old at that time. Monroe was saved from the depths—but of those early days there is little to say. God has seen fit to use him as an efficient instrument in the salvation of men, and if the instrument happens to have been effective for good it is only another evidence that God doeth wondrous things. A short time after his conversion Monroe became a worker in the mission. For over twenty of the thirty-two years that he has been connected with it he has been in full charge. During this time thousands of men and women have been converted in the rather dingy room which, from its location on the edge of the South Side levee district, is easily accessible to the class which is so in need of its ministrations — men and women who are down and out, who have lost their grip, and who have also lost hope of ever being any different.

Not all, however, who have experienced the joys of salvation in the Pacific Garden Mission have been of this stamp. There have been notable exceptions—among them "Billy" Sunday. The famous right fielder of the White Sox baseball team first came into touch with Harry Monroe at an open-air meeting on State Street when with several of his boon companions he drifted into the edge of the circle of listeners and heard some burning words which found a lodgment in his heart. That night he presented himself at the little mission, where, after a heart-to-heart talk with Mr. Monroe and Mrs. Clark, widow of the founder of the Pacific Garden Mission, he became imbued with a desire to do personal work himself. It was the beginning of his picturesque evangelistic c

"I thought maybe I'd have you do some other things first," Mrs. Taylor began, "but now't I've got matters arranged, I guess I'll have you get right at that dress. Of course, that's the main thing. Here 'tis. Once I didn't know but what I'd have to go and buy something; but last night after Rhodie'd gone I just happened to think of this old dimity of mine, and I went and got it out. It's exactly what I wanted. I've got one of her patterns here; and maybe, if I can't find anything else, I'll buy a little trimmin' of some kind down to Pearce's."

There was a long pause. Rhoda turned. Through the partly open door she had a glimpse of Miss Parks. With shocked dismay the seamstress was gazing at the gown Mrs. Taylor held up against herself. The girl felt her scant fortitude slipping. Noiselessly she stole across the kitchen and hurried up the stairs. She got the broom and cloth and dustpan from the hall closet and went into the front room. With lips tight pressed she began her day's task.

It was noon when she descended. The dinner table was set in the kitchen. Miss Parks came out quietly and the three sat down in silence. Little was said as the meal progressed. Once Rhoda glanced up from her plate and found Miss Parks's eyes fixed expressively upon her. The moment was almost too much for her self-control. She looked down quickly.

"Now, Rhodie," Mrs. Taylor remarked, as they rose, "if you had any ideas about how you wanted that dress made, you'd best let Miss Parks know. The rippin's all done, and she's about ready to go to cuttin' out. I'm goin' down town, and you and her can talk it over as soon as the dishes are done."

"I—I don't care how it's made," the girl stammered.

"Rhoda, we'll see," Miss Parks said positively. "We'll put our heads together. There's no tellin' what we'll make out."

The others went into the sitting-room, and the girl began to gather the dishes. She heard the front door close and knew that Mrs. Taylor was gone. She looked through the sitting-room door again. Miss Parks was sitting motionless before the work-table with a look of decision on her face. Before her lay the dimity.

A sudden sense of panic seized the girl. She wanted to escape, to get as far from that abhorred garment as she could. One great, choking sob escaped her, and she fled up the stairs and into her room. She did not hear the hasty pushing back of a chair below or the quick steps behind her. She threw herself fiercely, face down, upon the bed. Then a pair of arms went around her and held her close.

"Dearie, dearie," Miss Parks commanded, "don't you take on so. Don't you mind. You're goin' to have a dress. It's goin' to be all right."

For a long time the girl sobbed wildly on the plump, kindly shoulder, while a hand gently stroked her hair. "There, there, there," Miss Parks murmured, "there, there, there."

Then the sobs gradually grew fainter, and there was silence in the little room. Miss Parks rose and deftly straightened the pillow.

"Now, Rhoda," she said brightly, "I'm goin' to boss you a little. You lay right here and rest you good. I'm goin' down and finish them dishes; I'll have 'em all done before Mis' Taylor gets back. And there's one thing I want you to promise me; you've got to agree not to fret one speck more, not one speck. You're to lay right still, and you're to know that everything's all right—dress and all. You're not goin' to wear that dimity!"

Before the girl could answer, Miss Parks had drawn the window-shade, gone out, and closed the door softly. Firm, purposeful steps descended the stairs.

For a time Rhoda lay there listening to the rattle of china from below. Her brain seemed dulled and quiet. Then the slam of the front door roused her. She got up, opened the door, and dragged herself back to her work.

"It can't make any difference," she told herself miserably. "I can't take things I haven't earned. Miss Parks is awfully good—but it can't make any difference."

It was almost dark when she went downstairs. Her employer was laying the table for supper. "You all done up there, Rhodie?" she demanded. "It seemed as if I just couldn't get a chance to get up and see."

"No—I didn't get quite through, Mrs. Taylor. There's the back room yet. I'll do it in the morning."

Mrs. Taylor snorted. "Well, I ain't much surprised. I guess there ain't been enough accomplished anywhere in this house this afternoon to hurt anybody. Land sakes, I never knew Miss Parks was so puttery. She ain't made any headway at all, and I've had to be right with her every minute answerin' questions and gettin' things. And now she's up and declared she can't be here to-morrow. Had to go to Alton, she said. Didn't know whether she'd be back to-morrow night or not. I declare, if she don't do better than she has to-day, it would pay me to get at the job myself."

Rhoda did not answer. She was glad that work on the gown had been interrupted. She hoped it would never be resumed. And then, too, the interval would give her time in which to collect herself and recover her courage. She felt that it would take all the bravery her pitiful little pride could muster to face Miss Parks again and refuse her kindly offer.

But all through the next day, as she strove to make firm her purpose, she felt that she was not succeeding. The remembrance of those two protecting arms about her was always intruding itself. In spite of her efforts to stand alone her need of them seemed to be growing greater instead of less.

Her heart sank when Mrs. Taylor said impatiently at supper: "Rhoda, I guess you'd better step around to Miss Parks's and see if she's got home. I can't have the sittin'-room stand there cluttered up and nothin' bein' done. I'm 'bout out of patience."

To Rhoda, as she went down the steps, it seemed that her fortitude was going fast. And when she came to the row of maples along the sidewalk, it had well-nigh vanished. Then she was at the gate, and she stopped in dismay. There was a light in the sitting-room window. A shadow passed quickly across it as she stood there wavering between desire to retreat and desire to remain. The door opened.

"Rhoda," Miss Parks called, "is that you?"

There was no answer for a moment. "Yes—ma'am."

"Then you come right in here!"

Unable to disobey, the girl pus path. "Miss Parks," she began,

ALCOHOL THE FOE OF MEN AND NATIONS*

QUARTERLY TEMPERANCE LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

THE key for the interpretation of this temperance lesson is the proverb, "A man is known by the company he keeps." If a man or boy is frequently seen in bad company, it will be very hard to prove he is a good man when he is under accusation.

Now, alcohol is under accusation. It is on trial in the legislative bodies of many lands and in the court of public opinion everywhere. Its friends seek to show that its influence is good, that it promotes health and strength and gladness, and that the evil doings it is charged with are due to casual associates. Many if not most of those who vote to "abolish the barroom" in the United States, in Canada, in Australia, in Sweden, and elsewhere, continue to use wine and beer in their homes or at their banquets. Some of these not only condemn the public bar, but also distilled liquors—whisky and brandy and rum and gin; and yet they regard drinking wine or beer or champagne as a "small vice" at most. It is not the drink they condemn but its associations.

But why do they not see that when the associations of a thing are habitually bad through five thousand years—from the days of Noah and Lot down to our own—there must be something radically wrong in the thing itself?

We look about us in our streets or in the columns of our papers and find that alcohol is daily associated with cases of poverty that appeal for our aid and cause drafts on our purses; with crimes against person and property and against good government; with idleness, laziness, loafing; with lynchings, riots, and mobs. Then we turn to our lesson story of the eighth century before Christ—2,700 years ago—when the rough shepherd Amos, an Old Testament John the Baptist, was protesting as a fearless prophet against the drunkenness of both Judah and Israel, and we find grouped about "wine in bowls"—goblets were too small for these silk-clad swine—these other hints at wine's companions: "idle songs," "revelry," "violence," "captivity," and we are constrained to say, "The gang's all there."

Through all these centuries, especially the last, vain efforts have been made by appeals for "moderation" and by restrictive laws to separate alcohol from bad company, but it is still found in the same company as in the days of Amos. It is time that all should conclude that alcohol is as bad as the company it keeps, and that it be ostracized from every civilized community by total abstinence.

"Woe unto them that are at ease in Zion, and to them that are secure in the mountains of Samaria." Zion and Samaria represent the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, both of which wine had brought "woe" and would bring more. "Them that are at ease in Zion" pictures drinking church members, for they are generally "at ease" rather than in earnest. Alcohol dulls all our powers, but especially the noblest. Alcohol is an epicure that feeds on the very best parts of its victims, rushing through the blood stream to the upper brain to paralyze first and gradually destroy the latest additions to human development, the cells that give us judgment and sympathy and refinement and conscience and faith and zeal. It is as if some liquid were poured around the roots of a tree that rushed to the top to kill the best blossoms. Alcohol, as now admitted by medical science, is not a "stimulant" but a narcotic. Strange that any one ever thought a drug which in its full operation puts its victims into a dead sleep could be a stimulant. It is in its first shock of the offended system an irritant, that lashes the face like a slap, and creates a momentary warmth, quickly followed by a lowered temperature and a diminished vitality, a state of narcosis. It is disputed whether the word alcohol is derived from Arabic words, Al Gohol, meaning the chief devil, but there is no doubt that alcohol has been the devil's chief agency for keeping men from the church, and from all that is good, and in dragging victims out of the church into hells on earth. Shakespeare said: "O thou invisible spirit of wine, if thou hast no name to be known by, let us call thee devil," and yet about all the church members welcomed this rosy "devil" to their homes and even to their churches at that time, and even to-day a total separation from this evil through total abstinence is not yet generally required of church members. The church, as Christ's successor in the world, cannot "destroy the works of the devil," and leave enthroned the liquor traffic and the liquor habit. We need Paul's reminder that wine and spirituality are antagonistic. "Be not overcome with wine, wherein is excess, but be filled with the Spirit."

"Are they better than these kingdoms?" Hamath was the northern boundary of the Land of Promise, as outlined of God to Joshua and others, which Jeroboam II had restored. Gath was a Philistine city, which Jeroboam had fortified. The references to these cities is intended to suggest that material prosperity was abundant in the Israel of the prophet's day, but was not used for the glory of God and the good of men. The patriotic argument for temperance is too seldom presented in the United States in discussing moral evils. Nations have not died of free trade or free silver, but of free indulgence; not of conquest but of cancer. The German emperor is appealing to students, workmen and soldiers on patriotic grounds, for the sake of the commercial and military success of the "Fatherland," to take the pledge of total abstinence. The French Government also makes a patriotic appeal "for the future of the nation" in its municipal posters against "Alcoholism," which means "the chronic poisoning that results from habitual use of wine, beer, or spirits even to an extent that would not produce drunkenness." One hundred British cities also make a patriotic appeal in official municipal posters. "Strangely enough the very military leaders in the United States who proclaim the shocking prevalence of immorality and its physical consequences in the American army call for the restoration of the beer saloon as a remedy. In Canada, the minister of militia recently acceded to the plea for beer canteens as preventives of drunkenness, but on inspection he found fourteen soldiers drunk on "canteen" beer and abolished it in short order, with notice that the subject must not again be mentioned. The Daughters of the American Revolution have been misled into the same error, and have asked that canteens be restored to the army to promote sobriety and purity. Manifestly, the relation of morals to patriotism needs to be studied by many of our people.

"Drink wine in bowls." The picture here is of men for whom goblets are too small. They are like the swine that climb into their eating-troughs. Neither the rules of health nor those of manners restrained them. They expected to drink themselves under the table on festal nights, and be carried home like logs by their servants. They were not ashamed to be drunk. Just when we are developing in respectable people a feeling that it is dishonorable to get helplessly drunk, science is revealing the fact that those who never get fully drunk but are seldom wholly sober suffer more from alcohol in their own health and bequeath worse defects by heredity than those who have occasional drunks followed by long periods of sobriety. The insurance records of fifty years in Great Britain, where several mutual companies insure moderate drinkers and total abstainers separately, have proved that moderate drinking will kill young men of twenty, vigorous enough at that age to pass the severe test of insurance, in thirty-one years, cutting off thirteen years of life, as compared with the endurance of total abstainers who passed the same tests the same year.

"Therefore shall they go captive." The use of wine in Judah and Israel not only made individuals abject captives of appetite, but was also one of the causes of the overthrow of these two kingdoms and their captivity in Assyria—in one case without recovery, as the tragic name "lost tribes" reminds us. Somewhere the deep cause why God's own people lost everything worth while is given in the words, "They forgot God," and so we close with a story which suggests how remembering God may prevent the wreck of a soul. A mother took her boy to church for the first time, and he heard a sermon that even a child might understand, in part, on "Thou God seest me." A few years later she saw these words printed on a large card in ornamental letters for framing. She bought it and when her boy was asleep hung it where his eyes could fall on it as he awoke. He was delighted and came to welcome it as a morning visitor. A few years more and he went to the city to become a bank clerk. As his father was about to leave him in the bank, he took him aside and said: "My son, be obedient, obliging, civil, respectful, attentive to business, honest and trustworthy. You are now to form a character for life, and perhaps a fortune, too. Above all, remember your motto, 'Thou God seest me.'"

He promised he would, and conducted himself so honorably that he was fully trusted. The tempter whispered of opportunity to betray his trust to his own great enrichment. He at first put the thought aside, but the thought returned, and one night he remained after others left the bank on pretense of finishing some work. He walked to the vault, swung back the door and reached out his hand to take the money. It fell from his fingers as if it had been a bar of red hot iron, for just then the words flashed through his memory, "Thou God seest me." He fell upon the floor and prayed, "O God of my mother, save me from this crime." And God did save him. He told the bank president the whole story the next day, and was allowed to go away for a month to recover from the shock and prepare his mind for a faithful future. And never did he have occasion to recall with dread, but only with the joyous sense of a mighty Helper near, that golden shield of his life, "Thou. God, seest me."

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—NOW LET ALL OUR readers in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Million Bible Class help us in this Round Table to solve for each other the summer problems of parents and teachers and pastors and "city fathers":

How to provide recreation that will not prove dissipating to both physical and moral energy.

What to do to make Sunday school picnics happy hours and yet not harmful.

How to get the boys and girls safely through the two most trying months of the year, July and August, with no loss in manners or morals, but rather a true growth in body, mind and soul.

How to keep up the Sunday school in hot weather.

Ought not teachers and pastors to seek to influence those under their charge to choose for summer resorts places that furnish clean enjoyment rather than places where the ordinary rounds of amusements bring daily temptation?

What shall we do about Sunday school athletics?

Ought not the parents of every town to ask the "city fathers" to enact or enforce the curfew to guard our boys and girls against the perils of street roving at night—especially on summer nights?

Questions and Answers

Student, Port Jefferson, N. Y. Please explain Zech. 14: 6-8, inclusive. Although the prophet lived nearly five hundred years before Christ, was he not foretelling the day of our Saviour's crucifixion, and the miraculous conditions in nature that then occurred?

The whole chapter prophetically describes the last struggle with the hostile world powers, and the saving of Jerusalem by the Messiah who destroyed her enemies. The verses mentioned picture the dawning of the millennial day, which interpretation is confirmed in verse 9. The whole chapter is a grand picture of Jehovah going forth to war, the commotion in nature, the earthquake, the mingling of day and night, the battle, the victory, the world-wide establishment of the divine kingdom, and the rehabilitation of the Holy City.

Mrs. S. J. K., Jr., East Oakland, Calif. Our eleven-year-old son asked me recently, while studying his Sunday school lesson, how there could be God the Father, and Jesus Christ, the Son, and not be two people. Can you help us to answer this difficult question?

Professor Borden P. Bowne, one of the greatest, if not the greatest philosopher of recent American scholarship, held that we should not hesitate to acknowledge that each of the three persons of the Trinity is a distinct personality. According to this belief the union between the three persons is so essential and fundamental that the three literally make one; not one person, but one union, one unit, of which we get some faint notion in the perfect companionship of a husband and wife, where two souls are said to become one. On the other hand, Dr. Luther Townsend, author of Credo, practically denies that each member of the Trinity is a real personality in his effort to preserve the doctrine of one God. The best way to treat the doctrine of the Trinity, for adults and children alike, is to say that it is one of those many subjects that are too big for the human mind to grasp. Just how much must be and can be included in the word "person" we cannot tell. How much more than a person God may be we cannot tell. Of one thing we are absolutely certain, and that is that Jesus Christ reveals and represents the Father. Our ideas of God we get from him; the more we know about him the more we are convinced that he himself is God. When Philip asked to be shown the Father the Master said: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." And he had previously said to the Jews: "He that seeth me seeth Him that sent me." Our faith can rest here. To the Christian Christ is God. The rest we may learn in another world than this.

Mrs. S. K. B., Bethel, Ind. 1. The unpardonable sin, as already explained, is believed to have been attributing the works of the Holy Spirit to Satanic power. 2. Many volumes have been written on the subject of the Trinity. It is too large a subject to discuss in a paragraph. Excellent books on the subject are those by Burris, Mattison, and Lamson, any of which you can procure. 3. Jesus' advice to the young ruler (Matt. 19: 19), to "love thy neighbor as thyself," was a broad expression of the spirit of unselfishness and consideration of what is due to our fellow men. The possession of wealth too often closes the heart to sympathy and compassion. If we regard our fellow beings as equally with ourselves children of the divine Father and of the same family, we will not deny them any good thing which we might be able to give. Our means would thus become a stewardship for the dissemination of love and kindness, of gentle deeds and of tender solicitude for our brothers and sisters, seeing all are God's children. And our love for our neighbor and for whosoever needs our help will emulate the divine love, which goes out to all humanity.

A. O. Q., Hudson, S. D. When Paul commands the Corinthians that their women are to "keep silence in the churches," is it supposed to apply to all Christians for all time? Women uncover their heads in church, in spite of Paul's injunction, and our ministers do not protest; but when the women wish to confess Christ publicly, our ministers quote Paul; yet women, who have been abroad as missionaries, are permitted to speak in church. Is not here an inconsistency? We are Norwegian Lutherans.

In 1 Corinthians Paul was dealing specifically with the case of a church which he himself had founded. He had received intelligence from the household of Chloe, a pious member (see 1: 11), that serious schisms had arisen and that advice was sorely needed. From other sources he had learned that the church had sunk into corruption and error. Apparently four distinct factions had sprung up, all quarreling over their respective teachers. There was much bitterness in the situation, and, besides, he had learned that immorality and disorderly practices had crept in; also that their meetings were brought into disrepute by the women appearing in them unveiled (in defiance of the common usage among decent women of

NOTES ON THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR, EPWORTH LEAGUE AND BAPTIST YOUNG PEOPLE'S UNION TOPICS

Enemies in the City*

FIRST among the enemies of the church in the American city is the passion for gain. The old idea of herding together for protection has changed to the idea of coming together to find wealth. People do not come to cities nowadays to protect one another, but to compete against one another. The god of many an American city is gold, and the spirit of it is the spirit of greed.

This cruel greed gives birth to countless other horrors. The saloon business, the white slave traffic, the production of indecent plays, labor oppression, political corruption, back of them all is the terrible determination to make money. If the church should conquer this one greatest enemy, the rest, the other conquests would be, in comparison simple. Demetrius of Ephesus sums up in our Scripture reference the spirit of the city: "By this craft we have our wealth." Any movement which touches that program can count on furious antagonism.

The next great enemy of the church in the city is vice. Vice is closely allied with greed, but it also has a campaign of its own, apart from the work of greed. It works vigorously in the country, but more flagrantly and successfully in the city. As city atmosphere breeds haste and intensity, so evil things themselves and evil forces seem to grow stronger and quicker and more daring there.

Added to all the other enemies, and working with them, is the mere passion for pleasure. Harmless and natural as this is in itself, it is a desire that must be guarded and controlled. It simply cannot be given free rein. All the pleasures of the city are carried forward in the same intensified, aggerated way as its out-and-out crimes. Many of the amusements provided are planned largely for the visitors to the city, but this creates such an atmosphere of excitement and misery-making that even those who live permanently in the city are apt to be carried away by it.

Young people themselves will be saved from the perils, the excesses and the sins of the city by entering with their whole heart into the life and work of the church. A firm desire to be true to the highest ideals; an intense eagerness to help others; a clear view of Jesus, who is the only one who can save our American cities from crime; a warm spirit of neighborliness and friendliness, which can thrive in city as well as country; these are the things that will keep individual Christians and the church pure and triumphant.

*"Enemies of the Church in the American City." B. Y. P. U. Topic for Sunday, June 22, 1913. Acts 19: 24-34.

Missionary Tours*

NOT many of us can literally take a missionary tour. But we may study the tours that missionaries of the past and present have made. And, better still, we may, with papers, pictures, letters and books, make tours of our own which will make our comprehension of mission fields much wider and more vivid and our interest in them more keen and intense.

Plan out a missionary tour for your society. Make up your mind what countries you would like to visit. The missionary board of your own denomination will send you facts about the conditions there, and perhaps give you the name of some missionary to whom you may write directly. This will take some time, but for this present meeting you can arrange some sort of a tour, getting help from your pastor, or finding information in your church papers. You may find that your pastor or some member of the church has a personal letter from the field that he will lend you to read at the meeting. This will seem like a face-to-face talk with a worker in the foreign land. Study some missionary tours that have been made, particularly the one described in our Scripture references. The week's readings suggest other tours described in the Bible: Jonah's trip, Jonah 1: 1-3; 2: 1-4; home mission tour, Mark 1: 16-31; regions beyond, Acts 13: 44-52; an incident, Acts 16: 16-28; a great record, II Cor. 11: 23-33; missionary visits, Acts 8: 14-25.

*"Mission Work at Home and Abroad. VI. Missionary Tours." Christian Endeavor Topic for Sunday, June 22, 1913. Acts 15: 36-41; 16: 1-5.

Social Basis of Last Judgment†

ARE you really living as if you expected that your destiny through all eternity would be determined according to the standard laid down in this lesson? It is very simple. "Have you treated others," the King will ask, "as I should have expected you to treat me if I had been present in the flesh during the days of your earthly life?" The cup of water, the visit to the lonely, or the sick, or the prisoner, the sending of a garment to the destitute—have you done these things?"

The objection might be made that this makes the real basis of final judgment a matter not of faith but of works. It looks as if we were invited to buy our way into heaven. Is this so? No, but we know that our eternal destiny will depend upon our character. The real question will be: "What sort of a person are you? Do you like God and his folks and his ways? Have you got love in your heart, love for God and love for all men? Can you breathe the atmosphere of love? If so, come in, for this is where you belong."

The rest of the New Testament tells us how we may get this kind of a heart. It is by letting the power of the death of Christ destroy our sin and selfishness. Christ laid down the true principle of holy living; then he died to make such living possible. St. Paul and St. John explain particularly how faith in his blood brings about the great change in our souls, our dispositions, our plan of life.

As to rewards, we know that what we do on earth will make our reward in heaven. If we help and cheer and save any one here, that fact will meet us in heaven. The mere fact of the good deed done would be reward enough. There it is to stand forever—somebody blessed by us in Jesus' name. How can we possibly estimate the loss if we had not done it? How can we estimate the gain of doing it? Are we not eager to accumulate as great an amount as is possible of such heavenly treasure?

time) and that the feasts of the church were often scenes of gluttony and excess. His epistle was written to correct these disgraceful conditions, to set matters right, to rebuke the leaders and to set before them all anew the essentials of the Gospel. We can only infer, from the general contents of the entire epistle, that certain women who had been active in fomenting the trouble had merited a share of the chastening message, which doubtless produced the desired effect. It was not intended as a message to all the churches, but to the one particular church at Corinth, and it is a mistake and a grievous injustice to apply it to women in general. They have borne too noble and useful a part in the progress of the Christian religion to be subjected to any needless criticism that could only be based on a misunderstanding as to the actual conditions in the Corinthian church which rendered such a message necessary.

Mrs. S. P., West Newton, Ind. See the story of Abraham's sacrifice in Gen. 22. The patriarch came at God's call from Ur of the Chaldees. "Ur" means "fire," and from this fact, which may be interpreted as meaning that he came forth from the fire of the Chaldees, probably sprang up the tradition that for his disbelief in the idols of King Nimrud, Abraham was cast into a blazing furnace and miraculously delivered therefrom. The call is referred to in Acts 7: 2, 4.

Miscellaneous

M. V. M., McKenney, Va. The "mark" upon Cain has been a fertile subject of conjecture among Biblical scholars. Some hold that it was probably a sign given to Cain as assurance that no man should kill him, but the nature of the sign, and whether it was something perceptible to others, are left in uncertainty. One commentator suggests that it may have been an aspect of such ferocity that he became an object of horror and avoidance.

A Reader. Phi Beta Kappa is an honorary, semi-secret college fraternity, founded in 1776. Election to it is a mark of scholarly achievement and usually occurs at the close of the junior college year, when the members of the class having the highest standing are made members. Men attaining distinction in later life are often elected to membership. The motto, represented by the Greek letters Phi, Beta, Kappa, is one of the society's secrets.

PUT AWAY PICKLES

Mathematician Figures Out the Food Question.

If anyone requires a clear head it is a teacher of mathematics. He must reason in the abstract as it were, and full concentration of mind is necessary if correct results are to be forthcoming.

An Ohio man writes:

"I am a teacher of mathematics and for 15 years prior to four years ago, I either took a lunch composed of cold sandwiches, pickles, etc., to school or hurried home and quickly ate a hot dinner.

"The result was that I went to my afternoon work feeling heavy, dull of brain and generally out of sorts. Finally I learned about Grape-Nuts food and began to use it for my noon-day lunch.

"From the first I experienced a great change for the better. The heavy, unpleasant feeling and sour stomach caused by the former diet disappeared. The drowsy languor and disinclination to work soon gave way to a brightness and vim in my afternoon work, a feeling entirely new to me.

"My brain responds promptly to the requirements put upon it, and what is of more importance, the results have been lasting and more satisfactory, the longer I have used Grape-Nuts as a food.

"My wife had been suffering from weak stomach accompanied by sick headaches nearly all her life. She is invariably relieved of these when she sticks to Grape-Nuts, either eaten dry or with milk. Her stomach has gradually grown stronger and her headaches less frequent since she began to eat Grape-Nuts." "There's a Reason." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich. WAR THE STRONGEST ARGUMENT FOR PEACE

THE tragedy of a great war is not confined to the deaths of those who fell on the field. There is a greater tragedy in the grief of those who are left behind to fight the battle of life alone. Many tragedies begun with the death of loved ones in the Civil War are even yet being enacted in thousands of American homes, and the lasting grief of the wife who lost her husband, the sister who lost her brother, the mother who lost her son, is one of the strongest arguments against war that can be brought to the attention of the younger generation. War, where the smartly-dressed youth of the town march gaily away to the music of the band, "saviors of their country," is one thing to contemplate; war in the field, when the uniforms are in tatters, when the march has become a stumbling, staggering advance and the music of the band is replaced by the scream of shells, the heart-sickening groans of the wounded, the sobbing choke of the dying, is another matter altogether.

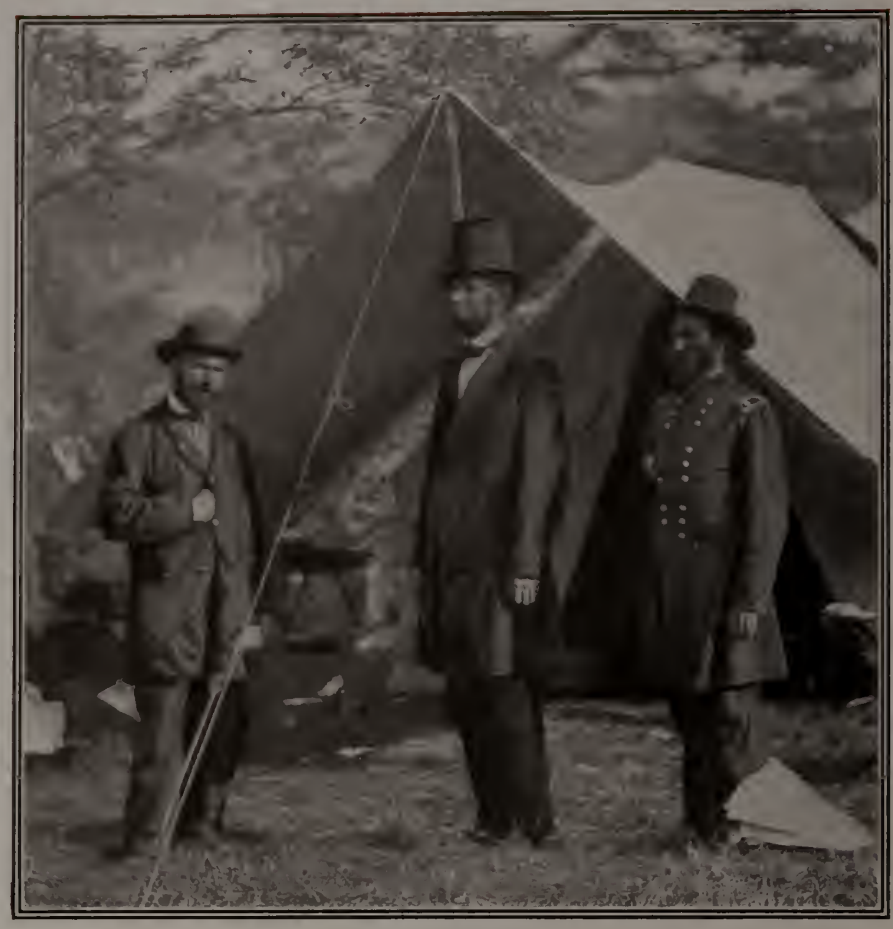
Horrors of Real War

This is the kind of war that is described in Lossing's history. This is the kind of war that is pictured in the 1,576 photographs and the 16 specially colored illustrations which are included in the volume. This is the kind of war which this volume will bring forcibly to the attention of the old and the young; the war that left behind it more unhappiness and grief than any other single event or series of events that ever happened in the history of the country; the war whose grave responsibilities, perils, horrors, should be implanted so forcibly in the minds of the young as to cause them to resolve that with their help it will never take place again. No one can read this book or see these pictures without arriving at the firm conviction that war should be avoided at any cost.

A Wonderful Panorama

Mathew B. Brady took these photographs at the risk of his life. As you turn the pages you see pictures of campgrounds, battlefields, regiments, hospitals, men in the trenches, dead, wounded, dying, the great leaders on both sides, 1,576 separate war photographs.

The book contains 512 pages, and in addition to the 1576 Brady Photographs and 16 Colored Pictures, there are 15 Maps and a Chronological Record of the War.



ALLAN PINKERTON — PRESIDENT LINCOLN — MAJ.-GEN. J. A McCLERNAND

One of the 1576 Brady Photographs

(Used by Special Permission of the U. S. War Department)

Included in Lossing's History of the Civil War

Think of it! Copies of the real photographs, "taken on the spot" by Mathew B. Brady and his men during the whole four years of the war. It was a feat without a parallel. General Grant saw many of the photographs taken, and in a letter in 1866 said: "The collection is valuable for the present generation, but how much more valuable for future generations!"

THE GOVERNMENT PAID $27,840 for these negatives, and they went into the archives of the War Department; but the people of the country never saw them. They were not serving their great educational purpose. The War Department granted permission to reproduce the photographs in this popular form, desiring to place them within the reach of all the people.

In Addition to the 1576 Brady Photographs

the work is further embellished with sixteen full-color plates of great battles and naval fights.

1. Grant in the Wilderness
2. Sheridan at Five Forks
3. Sherman at Kenesaw Mountain
4. Thomas at Chickomauga
5. Hooker at Chancellorsville
6. Meade at Gettysburg
7. McClellan at Antietom
8. Burnside at Fredericksburg
9. Battle of Shiloh
10. Sheridan's Charge at Winchester
11. Siege of Vicksburg
12. Battle of Gettysburg
13. Siege of Atlanta
14. Farragut at Mobile
15. The "Kearsarge" Sinking the "Alabama"
16. Battle of Spottsylvania

It is an amazing fact that 50 years after the war a faithful copy of the wonderful Brady War Pictures, taken at the risk of his life, can be obtained.

MATHEW B. BRADY, who photographed the Civil War and sold his wonderful collection to the United States Government was unique as a photographic artist. The reproduction from his famous war negatives shows in this history that he was fifty years in advance of his time. His photographs compare favorably with the best quality of work to-day. He was well equipped for this great work. In the early 50's, he was the representative photographic artist of the day. His studios on Broadway, New York, were patronized by the famous men and women of the period.

Brady's Marvelous Collection

The most important of all Brady's work is his marvelous collection of Civil War photographs. He secured permission from President Lincoln, and under the protection of Allan Pinkerton, of the Secret Service Bureau, Brady and his men started taking pictures, thinking that the war would not last more than two or three months; but for four long, weary years they were actively at work throughout the country. His wonderful collection of negatives of the great historic scenes and portraits of the leaders on both sides now attest to his energetic and remarkable work. It was these negatives that he sold to the United States Government, and by special permission of the War Department, reproductions have been made direct from the originals, which so fittingly illustrate, as nothing else could do, the vivid text of Dr. Lossing in this History of the Civil War. The reproduction of these famous negatives at this time, by permission of the War Department, not only commemorates the fiftieth anniversary of the war for the nation, but will leave a memorial to Mathew B. Brady for future generations as the photographic genius of his time.

Questions and Answers

Mrs. C. McD., Martinsville, Ill. 1. There is nothing in Romans to indicate Peter's presence in Rome at any time, but that is merely negative evidence. If he ever visited Rome, it was probably during the last year of his life, although Eusebius in the Chronicon says he visited it in A.D. 42. Jerome also mentions Peter's visit to Rome. Catholic writers assert that he was there for a number of years. There is no evidence of the fact in the New Testament books. It is generally accepted, however, that he was in Rome in his last year when he became a martyr as our Lord predicted (John 21: 18, 19). Dionysus of Corinth writes that Peter and Paul suffered martyrdom in Italy together. Irenæus confirms his presence in Rome. Caius, Origen, Tertullian and others bear similar testimony. 2. The writer of the poem "Rock me to sleep, mother," was Elizabeth Akers Allen.

W. C. T., Central Islip, N. Y. What can be done to fill the Protestant churches? I think one grave mistake the Protestants make is the want of a real catechism. Sabbath school is to some extent on that line; but I may be safe in saying that there is not one Protestant child in a hundred who can answer questions regarding the Bible that in any respect would compare with Catholic training. It is my prayer that God will direct Protestants to the church where they may show to the world their faith in Christ.

Our correspondent has touched a vital note. Child-training in the rudiments of the Christian faith is greatly neglected. The catechism is almost unknown in many of our Sunday schools, when it should be a prominent feature in all.

H. D., Ventura, Calif. 1. The reference in Luke 21: 32 (as in Luke 9. 27) is to the firm establishment and victorious progress, in the lifetime of some of those then present, of the new kingdom of Christ, which was to bring about the greatest of changes on the earth and to be the pledge of his final coming in glory. This is the interpretation of the passage as held by the best commentators. 2. Luke 16: 8, 9, are verses frequently misunderstood. Our Lord was showing how worldly people, "in their generation" and for their own selfish purposes, were prudent and sagacious in the worldly sense, and showed energy and determination in carrying out their mercenary plans, none of which, however, were for God and eternity. They were types of the money-makers of that day. Even from them, selfish and worldly though they were, the children of light might learn the lesson of concentration—not in relation to worldly, but to spiritual things. It should be noted also that (verse 8) it was not Jesus, but the "lord" of the steward, who commended the latter. The Revised Version corrects verse 9, which, accurately translated, reads: "Make to yourself friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness," etc., implying that they, "the children of light," should use money not as the steward did, for selfish purposes, but in doing good to others. (See Luke 6: 38 and Matt. 25: 34-40.)

L. B., Warren, Pa. What is the difference between the voice of conscience and the Holy Spirit?

This matter was quite fully discussed in the notes on the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topic "Obeying Conscience," for March 9, in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of February 26. The facts of experience hardly bear out the conclusion that conscience and the Holy Spirit are the same. Conscience is a faculty of the soul which approves or condemns according as one has or has not done what he believes to be right. By study of the Bible, prayer and the counsel of Christian friends one often finds that what seemed formerly to be right was in reality wrong. The Hindu mother throwing her babe in the Ganges believes she is doing right, and her conscience approves; but when she becomes a Christian she knows that such a sacrifice is wicked. In all nations and times certain souls have been alert and humble enough to hear the direct messages of the Holy Spirit, but it is through the written Word, the message of the Gospel and the knowledge of Jesus that the Holy Spirit comes to be a positive and constant fact of experience. The Christian tests the messages that seem to come from him by the Bible, by the personality of Christ, by the advice of Christian friends (see 1 John 4). The messages of the Holy Spirit are clear and positive, not hesitating and confusing. In the enlightened Christian the voice of conscience and the voice of the Spirit will always agree.

Mrs. B. A. P., Kalispell, Mont. Like several other prophecies, Matt. 24 has a twofold perspective. Dealing first with the prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, it gives warnings suggested by that event to prepare for the far greater event—Christ's second coming. (See also Mark 13.) In Matt. 24: 30, 42 both verses are interpreted as referring to the coming of Christ for judgment. Many preachers neglect this crowning subject in their sermons, although it is urged by Christ himself as the duty of all Christians to be in an attitude of prayer and expectation for the event of his return.

B. D. R., South Gibson, Pa. 1. There is no recorded evidence that a rainbow was visible from the earth before the flood (see Gen. 2: 6, 7). Some have held that these conditions lasted until the atmospheric change wrought by the flood, and claim that this view has scientific support, although it is in the nature of conjecture. 2. See the Scriptural statement concerning Noah's sacrifice in Gen. 8: 20. This was the first altar of which we have any record.

R. J. W., Laredo, Texas. Missionaries and other travelers affirm that nowhere on the globe is there a people who have no conception of worship of some sort, the sole possible exception being the natives of the Solomon Islands, who are said by some writers to have been absolutely without any idea of a Supreme Being, or any kind of worship, when first discovered by white men. Even idolatry must be regarded in a sense as an apprehension of an overruling Power, though a perverted one. The contention of skeptics that we have no right to enlighten the heathen cannot be maintained; for, if it be conceded that it is our duty to help our fellow men in any degree, we certainly should strive to enlighten them on the most vital of all questions: that which affects their happiness here and hereafter. Besides, Christians are commanded to "preach the Gospel to all the world."

Mrs. B. S. B., Factoryville, Pa. 1. In Rev. 7 the name of the tribe of Dan is omitted (Joseph being substituted), and commentators are divided in opinion whether this was because Antichrist was to come from Dan or because that tribe was to be Antichrist's special tool (Jer. 8: 16; Amos 8: 14). There was to be a Judas among the tribes just as there was one among the twelve apostles. 2. The "sons of God" (Gen. 6: 2) are believed to refer to the descendants of Seth, who were God-fearing, as the "daughters of men" are presumably the descendants of Cain. Mixed marriages among the religious and irreligious were an evil even in those early days. 3. The passage in II Cor. 12: 7, which speaks of Paul's "thorn in the flesh" has been variously interpreted. Alford and others have assumed it to be some bodily affliction (see Gal. 4: 13, 14). It may have been a form of physical weakness which interfered with his program of spiritual work.

Miscellaneous

M. R. W., Thurmont, Md. According to the creation story in Gen. 2: 23-25, marriage was instituted in Eden before the fall.

R. L. K., Farmville, N. C. All speculation regarding the lapse of time between the creation of man, the creation of woman, and the fall, is futile. Much has been written on these and other allied subjects of which Genesis tells us in its brief outlines, but conjectures even from the ripest scholars have given little or no additional light.

H. C. F., Iowa. The passage in Gen. 6: 3 is usually interpreted as meaning that God would allow a period of respite for man's repentance and not that 120 years would be employed in building the ark. It is regarded by some however, as implying the coming reduction in the duration of human life, which in antediluvian times was very long, and conducive to increase of wickedness.

R. C. W., Belleville, Ill. There are several religious bodies which teach faith healing by prayer and the laying on of hands. It is not general, however, among the denominations. But while the divine power is as great to-day as in the time of the early church, and while many remarkable instances of healing through faith and prayer are adduced, the usual teaching in the regular denominations is that, in cases of sickness, we should employ the remedies at hand through medical skill or otherwise, and ask God's blessing on these means to effect a cure.

THE CANNIBAL'S ALTAR POST

MR. AND MRS. SPRINGER, MR. HERMAN HEINKEL AND SOME BELGIAN-CONGO CONVERTS

THE SUB-CHIEF KAZEMBE

THE PASSING OF SLAVERY IN THE CONGO-BELGE

BY JOHN M. SPRINGER

FROM Ruwi to Malange is perhaps eight hundred miles as the crow flies, but being pedestrians and as the cannibals were carrying on extremely active warfare in the country traversed by the direct route, for safety we had to make a long detour that added almost two hundred miles to our trip. That was in July, 1907, and Mrs. Springer and I had reached the most westerly of the Katanga mines at Ruwi, with the intention of proceeding directly west to the line of Methodist mission stations in Angola. The southwest corner of the Congo was, at that time, a veritable hot-bed of cannibalism and slaving. All captives that the cannibals did not eat they sold to the Portuguese.

Such conditions had prevailed for many years, and the chances of improvement seemed extremely small. A few months later, however, the Compagnie Kassai, an immense rubber trading concern under the leadership of a chef du secteur, waged war on the cannibal Waleshi, and effectively put them to rout. Only here and there a few remain.

Seventy miles north of Lukoshi we found the stump, a picture of which is reproduced on this page. It was quite evidently a sort of sacrificial altar, as it was decorated with human skulls, mostly those of little children. The territory in which this was found was occupied by the Waleshi until less than three years ago. They were the worst slave traders of all the tribes of this section. It was very largely for their lawlessness and absolute disregard of the decrees of the Compagnie Kassai that they were driven from the country in which they had operated for so many years.

But though the Waleshi, with their ghastly practices, were driven out, the Bachokwe remained, and the traffic in slaves continued.

In 1911, we crossed over from Northern Rhodesia and opened a mission station on the Lukoshi River, thirty-five miles from the border. We were two hundred and fifty miles due west of Kambove, and one hundred and fifty miles west of Ruwi. We found ourselves practically in No-Man's-Land. The authority of government had been taken away from the great Compagnie Kassai concessi... and the civil authorities had not yet occupied the section. The chief, Kazembe, hailed our coming with delight, but we soon learned that his idea was for us to drive all the Belgians out of the country. He firmly believed that all we needed to do was to write a letter and all the Belgians would have to clear out. We also found that while slavery was not in full swing, it still existed, and that, hanging about the border, there were not a few Portuguese whom the natives said bought slaves. Domestic slavery was practiced openly.

Here is an instance of how domestic slavery is carried on: We had in our school a boy named Chiwahe. One day messengers arrived with the news that Chiwahe's father was dead, another man wounded, and that his mother and her children had been taken slaves. In the course of the next few days, we got the details. A sub-chief named Samalonga had owed a slave for some years to another sub-chief. At last, being wearied of constant dunning and possibly fearing an attack, he had made a night raid on this small village, killed one man, wounded another badly and had seized all the women and children and everything of value in the village and marched off. In telling the story, the natives repeatedly asserted that Samalonga had had no previous trouble with Chiwahe's father, and they laughed heartily as if it were a rather good joke on the dead man that he had been thus involved.

In a year's time several such murders were perpetrated in our vicinity. Every man carried a gun if he ventured out of his village. Kazembe ridded himself of a troublesome adversary by shooting him down in cold blood. "That is the way of our fathers," he said proudly. And naturally he resented the interference of a European government. When we returned from an extensive trip to the paramount chief's, Mwata Yamvo, last July, and found that this section of Congo had been taken into the Katanga and that officials from Elizabethville were occupying the country, we were greatly pleased.

MWATA YAMVO ATTENDING A SERVICE HELD BY MR. SPRINGER

Kazembe has been pleased to have the Belgians strengthen his position as chief, but he surely resents the edict that has gone forth that all slaves are to be free. One of his wives' slaves has come to our mission and wishes to stay, and Kazembe is very sore over it. At first, both he and the woman swore that the boy was their own flesh and blood. Finally, when confronted with the boy's story, they had to admit that they had gotten him as pay for this wife's son, who had been killed. Other slaves have come to us for refuge, and Kazembe feels that his rights are being trampled on when he is prohibited from shooting whomever he pleases and from

A FINAL STEP IN DEMOCRACY

SEVENTEENTH AMENDMENT OF OUR NATIONAL CONSTITUTION ENACTED AFTER EIGHTY-SEVEN YEARS' CONTEST

THE enactment of the seventeenth amendment of the constitution of the United States has placed our nation in possession of the most perfect theoretical democratic republican government in the world. This amendment provides for the election of United States senators by the direct vote of the people. On May 31 Secretary of State Bryan formally announced its adoption by the legislatures of thirty-six States and signed the document putting it in force.

A favorable vote by at least two-thirds of the State assemblies was necessary before the federal authorities could handle this subject, and though the agitation has been pressed with varying activity for many years it has never before been possible to obtain the required action by a sufficient number of States. Mr. Bryan has expressed the opinion that this enactment is the most important reform affecting the federal government that has been made in a century.

Considerable ceremony attended the signing of the document promulgating the amendment. Mr. Bryan was deeply impressed by the historic importance of the occasion and entered heartily into the spirit of those who wished to attach something of memorial value to the event. A large gathering of department officials witnessed the placing of the secretary's official signature, and there were several specially invited guests. One of these was ex-Congressman Harry St. George Tucker of Virginia, who was the ranking member of the majority side of the House committee on the election of President and Vice-President in the Fifty-second Congress when the resolution providing for the submission of this amendment to the State legislatures was adopted. Mr. Tucker is the sole survivor of the prominent Democrats on the committee who were active in supporting the resolution. Representative William W. Rucker of Mississippi and Senator William E. Borah of Idaho were invited to be present because of their close and active connection with the measure in its course through the House of Representatives and the Senate during the Sixty-second Congress. Mrs. Bryan and Miss Mary Sharp, a relative of Mr. Tucker, were the only two ladies present as guests.

SECRETARY OF STATE BRYAN SIGNING THE DOCUMENT PROMULGATING THE DIRECT ELECTION OF SENATORS

Mr. Bryan used four silver pens in signing his name and affixing the date to the document. With the first pen he wrote "William" and then handed the pen to Mr. Tucker; with a second he wrote "Jennings," and this was passed over to Judge Rucker. With a third pen he signed "Bryan" and gave the pen to Mrs. Bryan; with the fourth he wrote in the date "thirty-first" and gave this pen to Senator Borah.

"That marks the end of a long fight," Mr. Bryan remarked as he rose from his chair. "The struggle for election of Senators by the people began twenty-one years ago in Congress and eighty-seven years ago among the people."

"Yes," added Senator Borah, "it began in 1826."

Mr. Bryan is greatly gratified that the making of this official announcement of the ratification of the amendment has fallen to him as an official duty as secretary of state. He said in the course of conversation after the signing of the promulgation document, that he was elected to Congress in 1890 upon a platform containing a plank which pledged him to the advocacy of this reform. He voted in both the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses for the resolution submitting the amendment, and he has assisted in the writing of four national political platforms which have endorsed it.

MONT-LAWN'S GATES READY TO OPEN

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

TEN days from now THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S beautiful Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack-on-Hudson, will open for its nineteenth season. The gates will fly apart in welcome, and the smooth, green lawns, the graceful trees and the noble Rockland hills will smile a happy greeting to the hundreds of the tenement folk who are to come there this summer.

And the children, white-faced, tired of body, weary-hearted, and all too many of them burdened with the cares that God never meant his little ones to carry — they come to the Children's Paradise, which is to the little forgotten ones a combination of fairyland and heaven.

Many people who have never seen Mont-Lawn have read about the model cottages, the charming grounds, and the Children's Temple until they have been enabled to visualize the place; and so Mr. Corwin Knapp Linson, who drew this week's cover design, has helped them out by using his magic pencils and crayons and paints (in a clever way that only artists know) and transforming a perfectly plain sheet of paper into a picture that shows the Children's Home in all of its glory of youth and summertime. It's a "birds-eye view" of the beautiful place. So, people, first of all fill your hearts brim-up with the spirit of joy, and then imagine a great deal of childish laughter and hundreds of sparkling eyes. Then look at the picture and you will have a good idea of the Paradise that exists for the poor, neglected tenement children of the city.

Do you know that Mont-Lawn, since its opening, has made 40,000 children happy? Do you know who has made them enjoy themselves? Why, friends who have contributed, you are the ones that have made childish hearts see beauty and light and love!

I love Mont-Lawn. I would like to creep away from the city and take the train up through the country until I reach Nyack on the banks of the Hudson; and then, I would take my suit-case in my hand and run just as fast as ever I could until I reached the gates of the Children's Paradise. And as I entered under the happy, gold-colored little sign board that cries: "I Love God and Little Children," I would ask my fairy godmother to wave her wand over me and change me into a tiny little girl with tight pigtails, and freckles on my nose, and sunburned, scratched little arms and knees. And then I think that they would let me come in and play with the children, and wade in the tiny brook, and eat in Fort Plenty with the wind from the river blowing the hair on my forehead; and best of all, they would let me sing songs and wave my flag beneath the soft glow of the windows in the Children's Temple! Perhaps some of you think that my little soap-bubble dream is a silly one. But if you could see the home as I have seen it, you'd change your minds.

When I first visited the Children's Paradise, it was on one of those horrid, chilly, lion-like days of March. A fine snow, that was half rain, blew from one mountain to the other, and the river was covered with a heavy gray blanket of mist. The trees were bare and shivery-looking, and the ground was sullen, grayish brown. The sky was gray-looking, too, and the cottages were locked up, so that one had to peep through the windows to get an extremely vague idea of the interior. But Mont-Lawn is attractive enough to stand any amount of storm and mist, and bareness and locked windows. I am not exaggerating when I tell you that, as I drove under the welcoming gates, through the mist and the storm and the dim light, Mont-Lawn looked pretty to me. I realized then why the Children's Paradise is the name that gives the best idea of the delightful retreat.

Just at this time of the year the little East Side children are in a state of excitement. The visitors, and teachers, and social service workers are besieged with requests of: "Aw, lady, can I go to the country dis year?" "Please, teacher, ain't I been a good boy? Can't I go to the country?" and "Please, miss, I been sick, but if I went to the country it might make me all well."

And the lady goes away with tears in her eyes and sorrow tugging at her heart-strings, that they cannot all go.

I heard a story the other day about one of the small street children. A little boy had been promised an outing. He had been looking forward to it for two years, but the day before the start he hunted up the lady who had promised him his outing, and with tear-filled eyes sobbed: "Lady, I can't go."

"Why?" asked his friend, all sympathy.

"'Cause I'm strong and big," answered the thin little mite, "an' Mike, he lives on my street, is awful sick. Please, teacher, let him go instead of me."

There are so many tragedies of the city that are just as heart-breaking as this one. So many children that dream of the country, and look forward to the flowers, and pray for a sight of the green-clad hills, and then die without ever having seen anything more beautiful than sun-baked flagstones and grimy tenements, and a gray space of sky overhead.

The sorrow of it is that people know about such conditions, and yet are too busy to help. For in the beginning of summer there are new dresses to be bought, and trunks to be packed, and vacation tickets to be purchased. So many of the hurried people, who have the God-given chance to assist, turn away from the weak "cry of the children," and at most venture to shed a furtive tear, if they have time for pity. But pity helps very little. In spite of it the heat sweeps heartlessly through the city, leaving the usual train of small protesting victims in its wake.

God must have had children in his mind when he created summer. The green things of nature and the brooks that were made to splash in, and the bird songs all seem to be such an ideal background for childish laughter and happiness. But the cities have, in a measure, spoiled the divine plan. For how can the joy of summer-time enter into the crowded, work-filled lives that eke out an existence between high, dusty walls, which keep away the very sunshine of heaven? Oh, you people that care for little children, how your help is needed!

It takes very little to do good in this world of ours. Three dollars will send a child to Mont-Lawn for ten blissful days, twenty-one dollars will endow a cot for the season, making seven children happy during the summer; and five hundred dollars will endow a bed until the "Children's Paradise" has crumbled into dust. I know that my friends are some of the dearest in the world, and I know that they will want to help.

When the sun falls full on the pavement,
And children whimper and cry,
When the mothers sob in their anguish,
As they watch while the babies die;
Then, people of earth, who are happy,
Don't cast your eyes upward and pray,
But help with the goods that God gave you,
And send your small brothers away!

A GRADUATION PAGEANT OF BIBLE WOMEN

MRS. SILAS PORTER

MRS. CHARLES KLEINHANS

THE wideness of the late Dr. Klopsch's visions flashed upon me during the fifteenth graduating exercises of Mrs. Menninger's Bible class in Topeka, Kan. In my memory I again sat opposite him at his desk there in the old Bible House where I was telling him of the Bible studies of our Topeka women.

"When you go home write it up for us. Just give the facts. Send plenty of pictures." Those were his directions.

That request resulted in Mrs. Menninger being recognized six weeks later, from her picture that had appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and requested to take the platform at the Winona Summer Bible Institute. At three o'clock she started to speak and at six was still standing to answer questions. Later requests to formulate her teaching methods led to their publication in a little volume which has since been used by many of the Winona visitors.

Among the graduates in this year's class is one of those ladies who has studied under Mrs. Menninger's direction at Winona. This is Mrs. Nelia Gregg, of Harrisburg, Ill., who has taken two summer courses, and finally qualified to receive her diploma through a correspondence course. This is only a single example; for enrolled among this year's graduates are students from all parts of the country, from Michigan to California.

The splendid results of that former article prompted me to describe for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the rather unusual graduation exercises of the class this year. In it there may be some inspiration for other classes and Sunday schools to model their graduation or annual pageant exercises along similar lines.

A living pageant of Bible women was the result of the careful planning for this Topeka graduation. Kansas flowers are gay now, and both the gardens and the fields were called upon to provide the profusion of them that went into the decorations of the church. Temporary steps were arranged from the center of the pulpit platform, and down these the pageant flowed, making a veritable kaleidoscope of color.

MRS. C. F. MENNINGER

Mrs. Menninger, in the little address with which she opened the exercises, said that she had long wanted to present this pageant, but though among the two hundred women mentioned in the Bible not over one-half were of sufficient importance to be represented, she had never before had a class large enough to take all the parts. But this year there were a hundred members. There were eleven post-graduates, four five-year students, three six-year and four eight-year, in addition to the twenty-seven from the Tuesday division, forty-four from the Y. W. C. A. classes, fifteen from the Sunday or high-school division and four from Mrs. Kleinhans's Grantville class.

Dr. Charles M. Sheldon opened the services with prayer and a short address. Then from the vestry doors on either side of the pulpit the women in their strange and picturesque robes entered one by one to meet on the platform and pass in couples down the stairs into the auditorium of the church. Each graduate was dressed to represent one of the famous women of the Biblical story. The positive colors, so characteristic of Oriental costume, were largely used, and the effect was both brilliant and impressive.

In the course of the program the class memorial was presented by Mrs. Silas Porter, wife of Judge Porter of the Supreme Court of Kansas. The memorial this year took the form of a drinking fountain, which was presented to the Y. W. C. A. and accepted by Miss Marguerite Dice, secretary of the association. Dr. Sheldon presented the diplomas and the exercises closed with the song, "One of the Sweet Old Chapters."

The effects of Mrs. Menninger's unique work have been felt practically all over the United States. She has graduated eight different classes that have completed the four years' course of thirty lessons each year. Her own personality has been a large factor in this success and all her students have proved splendid workers.

The members of this year's graduating class are:

PEACE AND WAR IN THE BALKANS

THE honors of the achievement of peace—at least for the present—in the Balkans go to Sir Edward Grey, as the spokesman of the concert of Europe. On May 30 the treaty of peace between Turkey and the Balkan allies was signed at St. James' Palace, London. The proceedings were extremely brisk and business-like. Five copies of the treaty, one for each of the involved nations, were at hand and were passed around the meeting of delegates for signature.

Dr. S. Daneff, the Bulgarian peace delegate, in the course of an interview said:

"I am rejoiced. It means not only Balkan peace, but general peace, for Europe is saved from one of the most thorny problems of the Near East. We owe a deep debt of gratitude to Sir Edward Grey, whose enduring and untiring mastery in treating diplomatic problems has brought about peace much sooner than some of us had expected."

M. Popovitch, the Montenegrin chief delegate, delivered a short speech, in which he said: "We have signed the preliminary treaty because nothing else remained for us to do. We are glad to have peace, but are profoundly dissatisfied with the terms we have been obliged to accept. We have been despoiled of the fruits of our victories. We have been made the whipping-boy of Europe. We look here to secure a modification of the Albanian frontier, so as to give us lands for cultivation."

Sir Edward Grey has been both commended and criticized for his action, which was almost that of a dictator. He announced to the delegates that the time for delay was now ended and that this preliminary treaty must be signed in spite of all outstanding differences.

That such differences exist and that they are likely to cause trouble seems evident from the despatches which have recently arrived, telling of clashes between Greek and Bulgarian forces. The distribution of the territory which has been wrested from the Turk is the matter of contention among the allies. According to the agreement which bound the Balkan nations for the prosecution of the war, Bulgaria and Servia were to divide conquered northern Macedonia, leaving a section in the south for Greece. The declaration of the Powers that Albania should become an autonomous principality upset this prearranged plan. Bulgaria claims that she should have what was originally agreed upon. Servia feels that the treaty should be revised so as to give her a compensation equivalent to that which was outlined in the original agreement. Greece insists that all the territory of southern Macedonia, which is Greek both in nationality and tradition, shall come under the sway of the Hellenic throne. The feeling on all sides is strong and deep-seated, and it is believed that unless international intervention brings about a settlement nothing can prevent another war being fought out on the fields of Macedonia.

JESUS, ABSENT AND PRESENT

A SERMON

By

Rev. Richard Braunstein *

TEXT: "And he saw them toiling in rowing; for the wind was contrary unto them." Mark 6: 48

IT WAS evening in Galilee. The setting sun had thrown his latest ray across the sea, and his golden beams, pursued by the shadows of the valley, had crept far up the eastern sky. There, on the distant peak, in evening's beauty, they lingered for a moment as if to bid farewell for the last time to the valley below. The wandering multitude, which had seen and heard strange things that afternoon and which had so recently partaken of that evening meal prepared at the miraculous bidding of the Master, had dispersed. The last wanderer from the village had retraced his steps in anxious haste to relate the scenes of that eventful day. And now, alone on the fragrant mountainside that overhangs the sea, wearied with the painful misconceptions and sins of human life, Jesus has repaired in secret to watch and pray, while out on the freshening sea his disciples, in faithful obedience to their Master's constraint to pass before him into Capernaum, are toiling laboriously at their oars. The evening shadows are lengthening. The night is growing dark. The evening breezes that had been making ripples on the surface of the sea have united their forces and now a stiff gale from the north is piling the waves higher and higher on the pebbled beach. The watches of the night pass on. Jesus alone, in the mountain, is still in prayer. His disciples, toil-worn and sorrowful, are still bending at their oars; the wind still contrary and boisterous. But suddenly, about the fourth watch of the night, there is a great commotion in that little craft; each arm drops hastily its oar; each weary eye peers into the darkness; each heavy heart palpitates with fear; each troubled mind wonders. "A spirit?" But no! It is Jesus amidst the tempest and billows of the night, walking at their side upon the sea. Listen as he quells their fears with loving voice and words, "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." All is over now. The Master is with them. His presence fills them with new life and strength. The Master is with them, and at his command the wind and waves are hushed. The Master is with them, and the morning finds them in safety on Capernaum's shore.

The Darkness of Absence

In this brief outline of the Galilean scene suggested by our text, we have two quite distinct pictures which cannot but impress us with their suggestive and significant truths. One picture bears the name "Jesus Absent," and the other bears the name "Jesus Present." By the first picture we are immediately impressed with the fact that it is a striking representation of a soul with Christ absent. And in the second picture, by the altered scenes, we find a vivid resemblance to a soul with Christ present. In order that it may be clearly understood what is meant by having Christ absent and Christ present, it should be known that no fanciful or uncertain idea is intended. You remember that when Christ's disciples asked how he would manifest himself to them after he had passed from their sight, he said: "If a man love me he will keep my words, and my Father will love him, and we will come and make our abode with him." It is having God in our hearts and in our lives, a manifestation of the fruit of the Spirit, which is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, grace, meekness and temperance. When a man displays these characteristics and has an intense longing after righteousness, with all his soul, with all his strength and all his mind, and loves his neighbor as himself, then it is that Christ is present with him.

With this conception of Christ's presence let us notice a few suggestions that come to us from the position of those disciples that night on the stormy Galilean Sea with Jesus absent, which reminds us of a soul on this sea of life with the Master absent. The disciples started out on their journey soon after sunset. At first they could see very clearly, but as they receded from the shore it began to get dark. Soon night was covering them with its black pall. The way had been so plain at first, but now they cannot see at all. So it seems to me that the soul, starting out on life's journey without Christ, will find the way clear at first, but soon the way will be very dark. After a while a sense of lostness will be felt. It does not make any difference who it may be, whether a prince, surrounded by all that the heart could wish, or the peasant in the dingy hovel; however situated, he will find the way very dark, unless the Master is with him. The awful, hideous night of spiritual darkness, with all its doubts, troubles and fears, settles around him, and very soon hope, joy and the peace of his soul are gone.

Throughout the past men have striven intensely, and intensely they are still striving to live successfully without God. They employ the gifts that God gave them without a thought as to the manner he proposed. Without regard to him they use their minds with all their mighty forces as a means of fathoming the deep things of nature; they spend their lives with the sole thought of gaining a reputation or a fortune; they use their lofty ideals and noble purposes as a means of gaining the plaudits and admiration of the passing throng. They use their valuable lives in becoming rich in material things, but are not getting rich toward God. This is not the way that God intended men should live and use their endowments, but rather that they should seek first of all his kingdom and his righteousness, and after that all those other things shall be added unto them. If the soul, without Christ, could only be made to know the end of his journey there would be less sin and misery and despair in the world, and men would not rush headlong to their spiritual deaths. Let the multitudes that are following Christ pause in their pilgrimage to the better land, and make themselves more worthy of the name and fame of Christians and heirs to eternity by helping these brethren that are struggling, fainting, dying in their struggles against the winds and waves, and give them a helping hand and a message of hope and cheer wherewith to gladden their hearts. Let us, we that are in the churches, awaken to our discipleship and prove our calling by making this the King's business, our business, by serving him in a life of devotion and service and uplift and benevolence in the interest of our fellow beings. Let us show them what the Christian life is and means, and by so doing lead them to Jesus Christ and a larger hope and broader view of that better life which prepares men for citizenship in the city of God in the life to come, and makes them better citizens here, and the world a better world because men are living with the Word of God prominent in their comings and goings, their dealings in the market-place, and transactions with one another. Thus in drawing men to God we draw nearer to him ourselves and come to a fuller realization of what it means to have "Jesus Present" in our lives.

The Light of His Presence

Life at its best is full of storms. There are few homes that have not been darkened with distress and black clouds of trouble. There are few hearts that have not been sorely tried with grief. Look out across the sea of life, and see how those storms are raging now! Do you not see the baffled men and women, storm-tossed, sore, afraid, bewildered, toiling alone? When the weary soul without Christ is overtaken by these tempests, he can cry with the child of God, "Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts; all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me," but he cannot raise his head in triumph and sing above the winds and waves, "Yet the Lord will commend his loving kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be present with me." When he is overwhelmed with life's duties and hard burdens, he has no tender Saviour to whisper to him, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." When he is bowed down by sorrow and grief and his heart is breaking, he does not understand the language which says, "Cast all your burdens upon the Lord." When the sun goes down upon the horizon of his life and the skies are dark and he stands alone, friends having forsaken him, surrounded by a world that does not understand his malady, he knows not that Friend "that sticketh closer than a brother." There will come a day in his life when he shall do battle with a grim messenger, but shall suffer defeat and be forced to open his arms and a loved one shall fly away. It is the that he will not hear that voice of the Son of Go ringing down the aisles of time, "Let not your hear be troubled" and "I am the resurrection and th life." Because his heart and mind have not bee attuned to spiritual harmonies, when the day dawn that shall see him on his last journey through th valley of the shadow, he shall hear no glad welcom by the heavenly choir, singing the anthem of th blest, "Well done, good and faithful servant; ente thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Let us turn to our second picture, "Jesus Present," reminding us of a soul hid with Christ in God. In the first place I am sure that the most prominen resemblance existing between such a soul an the position of the disciples on the Sea of Galile with Jesus present, lies in the fact that both ar in the light. Our text tells us that "about th fourth watch of the night he cometh unto them walking upon the sea." The hour which ushered in the fourth watch of the night was the one which in the summer time (the season of the year in which the events of this chapter occurred) caught the first glimpse of the morning. It is a most suggestive fact that the hour in which the Saviour brought joy and rest and peace to the weary toilers of the night was the one which saw the first gleams of cheerful light break across the sea. It was the time of day in which the flowers awoke and the birds burst forth in song. Yes, Jesus came in the morning and all nature, which had been wrapped in darkness and storm, broke forth in praise around those to whom he came.

Calming Life's Storms

So it is always to the soul to whom Christ has come. His coming brings the light of eternal day, and fills the heart with a new song and a new hope and a new strength. When Jesus comes he dispels the gloom, and the way grows brighter, making us to see our destination and our home in heaven. The mission of the Son of Man was to bring light. How often did he say, "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not abide in darkness, but shall have the light of life." That light is shining for each of us now; it fills the earth and the heavens with the glory of God; it shines in splendor from every page of God's book and appeals to us to come forth out of gloom and sin, out of darkness and despair, into the hallowed circle of its radiance. It lights the way home, showing the weary wanderer the way to the Father's house. This holy light is seen reflected in the lives of men and women that are striving to make the world better by noble deeds and sacrifice in emulation of Him who came down from heaven with healing for sin-sick souls. This light is seen reflected in the lives of men and women who are not only praying, "Thy kingdom come," but are also striving to make that kingdom come by doing the will of God; for where God's will is done, then and there has the kingdom come. So many of us are praying that great prayer, but want the kingdom to come our way instead of God's way. Not according to the gospel of us, but according to the Gospel as set down by Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. Not the gospel according to me, but according to Jesus Christ, who said, "Do unto others as you would have others do to you." We shall soon know and the world shall know by these standards whether Christ is present or absent in our lives.

This, then, is our message: "Christ can still the tempest. He can control the sea of life. He has traveled across it. He calms the bitterness of its storms. He has felt the power of its ill winds. Thus, knowing the supreme power, joy, hope, peace and light of having Jesus present, in every storm of great stress that may blow, in every billow of temptation and sorrow that may roll, we shall hear him saying, "Peace, be still." Jesus with us! When he is with us the breaking of that eternal day shall find us safely landed on the celestial shore. If your life is one of darkness and despair, if your heart is aching and you are storm-tossed, toiling, sore afraid; if the winds are contrary unto you, pray God that he send Jesus, the light, into your life. Pray the heavenly Father for the sunrise of a new and better and more perfect day, which shall find you secure with Jesus present.

DAILY MEDITATION

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.

SUNDAY, June 22. Proverbs 23: 29-35. "Look not upon the wine when it is red. . . . At last it biteth like a serpent." This is the contrast between the winsome and the deadly: it is the deadly beginning as the winsome, charming me with brilliant and sparkling hues. The thirsty man looks upon the glowing wine. The delicate translucency bewitches him. He holds it up to gaze upon it before he drinks. It is exquisite and delightful! But "at last it biteth like a serpent." The exquisite hides the destructive. The light is the home of the lightning. The sparkle is really the glint of a foe.

Men often become drunkards through the harmless door of sociability. It "looks friendly" to take a glass. It is a sign of geniality. It is only the morose who stand aloof in abstinence! Who wants to be a skeleton at the feast? Who wants to be a wet blanket in the glowing throng? And so in order to be companionable men begin to drink. It begins as geniality, but "at last it stingeth like an adder." It seemed to be the friend of sociability, and it ends by destroying all fellowship.

Let us be on the alert when temptation comes to us as "an angel of light." Let us be especially vigilant when he makes drink to sparkle in the glass. The evil one is an expert at making death simulate life. He borrows the colors of paradise to adorn the way to destruction. The sirens could sing with the loveliest voices of women. Satan can mimic Christ!

MONDAY, June 23. Genesis 27: 22-40. Let me remember that the wearing of any kind of false skin is an offense unto God. Let me remember that all mere seeming, which does not agree with reality, is a sin against Him who is the truth. Jacob put on a skin that he might personate his brother Esau. I may not imitate his deception, yet I too may so dress up things as to make them appear other than they are.

Malice can clothe itself in the skin of courtesy. It can endue itself in politeness. Treachery can veil itself in a kiss. Ill-will can hide itself in compliments. An ugly purpose can conceal itself in soft and bewitching tones. Nay, murder can crouch behind a smile. Menace can approach behind a friendly gesture. In all these ways the sin of Jacob can be repeated: the differences are only seen in the changes of the skins.

Now the only way to escape Jacob's tragedy is to be passionate lovers of truth. A fine, healthy palate is the only defense we need against putrid food. A refined, artistic touch is our best safeguard against daubs. And a clean heart is our protection against all falsehood. A man with a clean heart recoils from a lie as a man with a clean mouth is repelled by noisome food. To a truth-loving man a lie is horrible; he spurns it with loathing.

And so this must be my prayer, "Create within me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

TUESDAY, June 24. Genesis 28: 10-22. It is always a great moment in life when our God is unveiled to us in unexpected places. To stand in some unfamiliar spot, and see "a ladder set up on the earth, and reaching even to heaven," always marks the beginning of a new and larger life. To pass into some new and strange set of circumstances, and to behold the divine ladder of light and glory, is a great discovery for the soul. To grope in the darkness of some chilling disappointment, and in the deepest hour of the night-time to see the shining stair, is to receive one of the surprises of God's good grace. Or when we have sinned, and we think our secret is unknown, and suddenly we see the holy ladder, then our little world is filled with confusion because we have come in sight of the great white throne. But always and everywhere, in noontide or night, in society or solitude, the appearance of the ladder means the breaking up of our littleness, and the opening out of a larger life.

Now it is our blessed privilege to become so intimate with God that we shall see the ladder everywhere, and there will be no spot on earth where the shining communion does not rest. We may see the ladder in the privacy of our chambers, in the busy workshop, in the green pastures of rest and recreation, by the still waters of seclusion, or in the dark valley of the shadow of death. Happy, thrice happy are they who are accompanied by the shining stair, as the broad belt of moonlight upon the waters follows the wayfarer as he trudges along the shore!

WEDNESDAY, June 25. Genesis 3: 1-17. Jacob found the fruits of his wrestling at Peniel in the love, and long-suffering, and forgiveness of his brother Esau. While he agonized with the angel God's healing energies were doing their blessed work in the soul of his brother. How much the good Lord is doing in the dark! What wonderful things are born in secret, and no one knows whence have come the seeds! Man makes a railway, and cuts a wide gash through a land of loveliness, leaving a terrible scar. Then nature takes the ugly thing in hand, and bringing her seeds from near and far she clothes it in beauty. Nature heals the wounds while man goes about his appointed work.

And God has healing and restoring energies in the soul. And ours is the holy privilege of making them operative by our prayers. When we pray for another we set the energies at work. Jacob prayed at Peniel, and God's forces of spiritual health began to move in the soul of Esau, converting bitterness into holy longing, and harsh and fierce resentment into gracious good-will. By our prayers we can bring new springtide into lives that are held in the bondage of cruel winter.

A man's Peniel is therefore always the minister of spiritual spring. When he wrestles in intercession he is co-operating in the creation of spiritual flowers and fruits. He is making a climate which will convert estrangement into communion, malice into benevolence, and feverish revenge into fervent love.

THURSDAY, June 26. Genesis 37: 23-36. I learn from the earliest teachings in the Bible that when a thing is done it is not done with. When the brothers sold Joseph into Egypt they thought that the whole thing was done. The business was ended, and there would be no entail! They had devised a grave from which there could be no resurrection! It was a blind mistake. They had not dug a grave, they had only prepared a harvest. Every deed is a seed, and is sure of its progeny. No deed is seedless: in itself it is a seed, and no one can stay its harvest.

This is at once the grandeur and the fearfulness of life. Everything tells, everything counts! Every deed has its issues. Nothing falls dead and infertile. This makes life very grand, for even the apparently trifling nobility is destined to entail to itself retinues of glory. To give "even a cup of cold water" matures itself in rich reward. To wash a disciple's feet brings a gloriously enriched communion with the Master. To offer hospitality to a stranger is to entertain God.

On the other hand, such a principle makes life very fearful. We are always sowing seed, and we may be sowing tares as well as corn. We may sow blasphemies and reap dragons' teeth. We may sow frivolities and reap insensibility. "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap."

FRIDAY, June 27. Genesis 41: 25-43. In all the malicious designs of Joseph's brethren there was an unseen and unrecognized antagonist. They had forgotten God! In all their plans the main factor had been ignored. It was as if a man should seek to build a house and overlook the force of gravity. It was as if a man should seek to construct a reservoir and should ignore the laws of hydrostatics. The house-builder would find his presumptuous work toppling over in confusion. The constructor of the reservoir would be submerged in the unimprisoned flood. Joseph's brethren left out God, and God overturned their work, and laid their pride in the dust. He took their victim and made him the companion of kings; he took the outcast and set him in lofty places.

We may ignore God, we cannot miss him. We may decide to leave him out, but he will most surely be in, either as enemy or friend. If we do not build him into all our structure we are fashioning not houses, but rubbish heaps. If God be ignored he becomes our foe. "The grass withereth, because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it," and that same destructive wind blows upon everything in which God is not hallowed and glorified.

Joseph was sold as a slave; God laid hold of him and made him ruler. He was led through captivity to sovereignty. His brethren were led through apparent triumph into humiliation, and confusion, and fear. The Lord "stood within the shadow, keeping watch above his own."

SATURDAY, June 28. Genesis 42: 1-17. Roads in life have a strange way of turning, and we come face to face again with things we had long forgotten. Our business leads us to our native town, and buried sins troop out of their graves. We come upon one of our early altars, and many miles of irreligious living stare upon us. Joseph's brethren come into Egypt, and they meet their brother again, and memory recalls every lurid detail of their treachery, and they are filled with fear. Life has strange resurrections, and we never know when they will happen. Just when we are feeling most secure, when all about us is like a garden, the earth opens, ghosts of the past appear, and we are pursued by our old forgotten sins. Egypt became an awful opener of graves for Joseph's brethren! They went for corn; they found the great white throne.

Beautiful is it when awakened memory brings forth sweet angel presences, and not the bodeful ministers of fear and judgment. Beautiful is it when memory brings messengers to deepen our peace. And this is surely the gracious will and purpose of our God. It is his will that whether we open the door of memory or the door of hope we may be attended by welcome guests who sing songs of rest and inspiration. Yesterday and tomorrow may be in concord in bringing the soul the sweetest.

But if memory brings dreads and fears, even these can the good Lord deal with. His forgiveness can transfigure them. He can clothe a fear in a wedding garment and change it into a minister of thanksgiving.

These Daily Meditations will appear in each issue through 1913.

A HIGHWAY TO PEACE

BY P. A. GILMORE

TO SEE the good in others rather than the evil; to loathe the sin, but to think kindly of the sinner; to look carefully when criticizing others lest any root of bitterness in me cause me to be a castaway; to guard well the door of my lips, allowing no profane or unseemly word to pass those sacred portals; to love truth, to utter honest words; to be kind to strangers, knowing that ofttimes men entertain angels unawares; to treat others as I would have them treat me; to be true to friends and just to enemies; to forgive and forget personal wrongs; to return good for evil and thus make a flower bloom from a weed; to fear nothing but cowardice; to hate nothing but sin; to admire the charm of youth and to venerate old age; to be courteous to children and kind to dumb animals; to be honest in my dealings with others, knowing that a double life cannot have a single virtue; to love God and the church, notwithstanding its imperfections, and to work and pray for the attainment of its ideals; to admire the beautiful in literature, in music, and in art; to cultivate a love for nature in her various forms—the song of the birds, the sighing of the winds, the music of the waters, the stateliness of the forests, the grandeur of the storm, the sublimity of the mountains, and the majesty of the seasons; to look upon life as a God-given opportunity to improve, and to make others happy; finally to think, to speak, and to do as God designed I should, and, having done all, to look up and to be resigned.

YOUNG MEN FOR THE OLD FAITH

THIRTEEN HUNDRED Y. M. C. A. DELEGATES ATTEND THE INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION AT CINCINNATI

"YOU stand for true social democracy and for true patriotism. And in these days of social unrest we need you, God knows we need you." These words, from the Rev. Samuel Tyler, of Cincinnati, greeted the more than thirteen hundred Y. M. C. A. delegates assembled in that city for their thirty-eighth international convention, which lasted from the 15th to the 18th of May.

"There never was a time in the history of the world," declared John R. Mott, from the platform of the convention, "when opportunities for spreading the faith of Christ were so great as they are today. In the Turkish Empire, in the Balkan States, in Russia, in Southern Asia, in Africa, and in Latin America the harvest is ready to a degree never before known by the church. When I first visited Constantinople in 1895 I heard a crack of rifles as Armenian men and women were being murdered because they were Christians. To have suggested a meeting to preach Christ would have meant death. A few months ago we could not find a hall in the city large enough to accommodate the crowds who wished to hear us speak of the glories of Christianity. The same is true in Egypt and Japan. At the Imperial University of Tokyo, where the graduating class numbers 5,000, the attendance at our meetings was simply marvelous, and the students and professors joined the faith in large numbers. It was the same in China and in India. But if the opportunities are great for the spread of Christianity, the present time also is the most dangerous in history. Wireless, railroads, cables and steamship lines have made this world a very small place, and the racial problem is becoming more and more acute.

"We cannot afford to treat the matter of Japan and California lightly. I have been asked by Japanese statesmen recently what is the solution. The best solution would be to keep our poise and try to turn this difficult corner, and then, when we are calmer, fix up the laws in accordance with the teachings of Jesus Christ. This may work out the problem. With the present facilities for transportation we cannot keep out the young men of the East. The solution is not segregation, not amalgamation; not in education, but in Christianity. Put Jesus Christ in the hearts of every one and you will keep this world from danger. The nations of the world are at present in a plastic condition, and as they are set at present, in a Christian or anti-Christian mold, so they will remain. The corrupt influence of Western civilization is felt in the Orient, and during the next ten years the millions there must be won for Christ or the chance may never come again.

"The Y. M. C. A. should take the whole world in its plans. At the Philadelphia convention in 1885 we sent two missionaries, our first, to foreign fields. It was enough at that time, but now there is work for thousands, and within the past twenty-four hours more than a score of secretaries at this convention have offered themselves. This is a great time, too, for a unification of all Christians. A divided Christianity means an unbelieving world."

A GROUP OF THE LEADING WORKERS AT THE CINCINNATI CONVENTION

At the close of the session a number of prominent businessmen signified their desire to pay the salaries of the young men who had volunteered for missionary work. Earlier in the convention Alfred E. Marling of New York briefly commented upon the written report, which was in the hands of every delegate. Some of the points brought out showed great advance during the past ten years. Increase in members from 323,224 to 566,101. Increase in buildings from 414 to 756. Value of property from $28,500,000 to $81,600,000. Current expenses from $3,171,000 to $10,155,000. Foreign countries entered from 7 to 18, and tuition receipts from $60,000 to $628,500.

THE BURDENS OF A "FAMBLY"

BY DELLA DIMMITT

A Story Complete in This Issue

FORCED by the exigencies of the situation to a swift choice he took the stairs. It was not their steepness so much as the very singular way they had of slipping from under, and soaring up mountains high ahead of him, that made the ascent dangerous in the extreme. But the pursuing terror that might at any moment lay hold upon his heels was so much the more to be dreaded that under the circumstances any man, however unstable his balance, would have preferred the risk the stairs involved to the unsheltered open of the street.

Glancing fearfully over his shoulder now and again, after much painful and exhausting effort he finally did succeed in scaling those slippery stairs, and, as if in direct answer to his prayers, right at the head of them stretched a settee. It was not long enough, and he had to let his legs hang out and dangle over what he knew to be a dark and dismal abyss reaching down clear to nowhere. But there are times when one has to risk even legs. His were not very valuable, anyway, so he spoke to them not at all reproachfully, but as one in whom the bitterness of parting is no more, "Well, go if you loike." But in spite of permission, the legs didn't go. They merely hung and threatened while the rest of him, too weary for discussion or controversy, lapsed off into gentle slumber.

It was the snoring that first apprised the deaconess that she had a caller. She was used to callers; nevertheless, as a precaution, she kept the door leading from this wide humanitarian upper hall of the Institutional Church here on Halstead Street into her own snug quarters securely bolted. She slid the bolt firmly but cautiously, and her eye fell on the limp thing that for want of a better name we still, even under such circumstances, are compelled to call a man.

"You're pretty far gone," she said to him, going over for a nearer inspection. But before she had quite time to re-enter her room and call up the police station a small creature, enveloped in a dingy shawl miles too big for it, appeared at the head of the stairs, and in one swift bound reached the side of the sleeper.

"You wuthless critter," she flung at him in a high, penetrating key; but seeing that he was beyond the reach of upbraiding, she fell to searching his pockets, drawing forth with no small degree of triumph a dollar, intact, and some smaller loose coin which she immediately transferred to the pocket in her short skirt, and which she proceeded to secure by a large bent safety pin thrust through on the under side.

The deaconess eyed her with a certain degree of amusement mingled with pity. She was only a wisp of a girl, twelve years old or hardly that, but there seemed actually nothing childish about her except this brevity of skirt. She was as soberly and capably going about the management of this "plain drunk" as any judge on the bench, and the way she had managed her search for funds betokened uncommon ability in the executive branch of the business. "I've fixed ye," she said at length, and for the first time she seemed aware of the presence of the woman in the scrap of a black bonnet tied with white strings. "I'm sorry to be troublin' ye wid my fambly, ma'am," she said in a voice that in its singing sweetness was manifestly different from the one used on the "fambly." "He's the plague o' me life. I will be reformin' of him yet, but he watches his chanct and whin I get busy playin' wid the kids he's off an' the money spint. I headed him off fine this time afore he'd got to the end of his rope." She tapped the region of the hidden pocket.

"Suppose you let him sleep it off right here," suggested the deaconess. "He can't do any harm, and that will give you and me a chance to get acquainted. I think I'd like to know you." She led the way into her own dainty apartments.

"So this is where you live?" and the little old woman-child looked about her in frank curiosity. "Where's your man?"

The deaconess was not prepared for that, but she explained as best she could the fact of her spinsterhood. Still less was she prepared for what followed. "So you hain't never been married at all? Why, you pore thing, you! Air menfolks so scarce-like and hard to get where you was borned and growed up?"

Outwardly the deaconess was gravity itself, and she set herself resolutely to draw the child out regarding herself. The details were pathetically brief—a mother dying, a father losing the influence that had held him to a straight course, and now—Halstead Street, and these periodical sprees that were slowly submerging the irresolute man and his child.

The deaconess was quick to feel the tragic element underlying it all, but to the whimsical creature relating the tale there was nothing in it but the common, acceptable facts incident to all life everywhere. When her new friend expressed pity for her she merely shrugged her shoulders, exclaiming indifferently, "Oh, pa—he ain't bad—he don't never come home throwin' things and bustin' up the furniture, and he don't go beatin' me when I don't get things to his taste, the way Mamie Flymm's pa done. And he takes all the jawin' I lays up fur him when he gets to hisself, just as nice and lam'-like as if I was his own mother. And I do give him fits sometimes, same's a mother'd ort to. I don't never mean to be too hard on him. Course it's fittin' fur him to take a bit o' pleasurin' fur hisself. He ain't grudgin' me mine; but twict a week is too often fur any man to get full. Now ain't it, ma'am?"

The deaconess thought it "twict" too often, but she refrained from expressing herself just then. Indeed, there was no chance, for the child's exploring eyes, so rich and deep a brown, were taking an inventory more detailed and complete than any tax assessor ever compassed in a like given time. "This here's a terrible clean place," she said at length. "Is them your folks?" forbearing in the asking to more than indicate with her soiled forefinger the near-at-hand family group. Assured that it was, she added, "You've got a terrible clean fambly. Mine's so dir-rty." And she sighed.

"I wonder if you wouldn't like to see how we manage it?" The deaconess was used to acting on impulse. She was sure she was following the right one now, when she led the way into her own private bath, and turned the water on in the immaculate tub. "See," said she, "I bring the water up to that knob, and then I get into it, every morning of my life, Rosie."

"Ivery marnin', ma'am?" exclaimed the child in wide-eyed astonishment, "why, whatever can ye be doin' to git such a deal o' dirt on that ye have to be

A GIRLS' SCHOOL IN TIBET

GIRLS going to school on the roof of the world! That sounds rather odd, doesn't it? There are two very good reasons why it should. In the first place they have not been doing it very long and in the second we know so little of that sealed land of Tibet and that little is so wild and strange that we have never connected it with such an ordinary proceeding as going to school. From her far outpost of Christianity at Khalatse, where British India joins Tibet, away in the fastnesses of the Himalayas, Mrs. S. H. Ribbach, of the Moravian Mission, writes of the girls' school she has begun in that strange land.

"For nearly six years I tried to start a girls' school at Khalatse," says Mrs. Ribbach, "but in vain. 'We peasants have so much work that no time remains for learning; besides, our girls are not gifted. They'll be too stupid to learn,' say the mothers. 'But because they know nothing and because you think they are stupid I want to teach them. Let them come to me for a trial,' has been my answer. For a long time the girls themselves gave the same excuses, so I had to be satisfied with teaching those who have been connected with our own household at different times. Then, last winter, when I had nearly given up hope, two little girls suddenly appeared to ask me if they might come to school. They were, of course, given permission, and to my great delight, during the following weeks they brought in some more girls, and these, in turn, drew others, so that there are now thirteen in all, besides three Christian orphan children.

"The work has had some peculiar and sometimes rather comic difficulties. In the first place, to find out the girls' ages has been a matter of close computation and considerable guesswork. The Buddhist counts a cycle of twelve years with the following names: cat, ox, tiger, hare, dragon, snake, horse, sheep, ape, bird, dog and swine. In the most favorable cases a girl will say, 'I was born in the ox year,' and as 1913 happens to be an ox year it means that the child is twelve years old. A birthday no one can tell. The nearest to an exact date that one can get is the statement that a child was born 'before the plowing,' which here in Khalatse means in the beginning of March. Or one is often told that the time of birth was 'at the barley harvest,' which is in the middle of July, or 'when the buckwheat was cut,' about the end of September. At last I found that the youngest girl was about eight years old, while the oldest was two cycles—or twenty-four years.

"It may seem strange to girls of this age in America, but only a few of these new charges of mine have any sense of cleanliness. One of their proverbs says: 'In the hands of a Tibetan all color dies," so when their names are called at the beginning of a lesson they are strictly examined for the evidence of any growing love of the use of water. At first I had to be satisfied with clean hands and faces while neck and arms offered a terrible gray-black contrast. But nowadays these too are being censored and rewards passed out for cleanliness as well as for regular attendance and attention.

"We began with knitting and sewing. The poorer girls are supplied with wool free, whilst the fairly well-to-do parents are expected to provide for their girls. Great pride was displayed over the first knitted mittens and the first simple pieces of needlework. These, of course, became the property of the girls who had made them.

"When we began reading lessons it was soon discovered that the smaller girls retarded the progress of the older ones, so Martha, Odga and Dondrub, the Christian orphan children, are serving as monitors, and their skill and patience are often sorely tried in the attempt to teach those about their own age. The middle class is being managed by Chompel, our native evangelist, and I take the most advanced group, at the same time keeping general watch over the others.

"It may sound easy; but what a time it takes until they grasp and keep the thirty letters of the Tibetan alphabet! Ambition is entirely unknown to them and they take the whole thing as a matter of play, so one must laugh with them until they get used to a little discipline. Too much strictness at the outset would only drive them away. They continually made a muddle of the letters they were attempting to learn, and the conquest was only made after each letter had been attached to some definite idea, such as that of a sheep or a goat, with which they have been familiar from their babyhood. It is amusing how they add the polite syllable le to each letter—for instance, repeating the alphabet a-le, b-le, c-le, etc. The letters ng indicate profound thinking to the Buddhist mind, so one girl reflects aloud ng. f-le,ng, g-le, and so on until one's brain is fairly in a whirl from trying to follow them.

"After the stiffest part of the reading had been mastered, singing lessons began. The girls have very little ear for music, and when the organ played a deep note they would sing a high one, or vice versa, without realizing that there was anything the matter. It is quite incomprehensible to them that while singing they must stand up straight and not hold their hands in front of their mouths. During the first lesson they usually laugh more than they sing, especially when, or rather because, I expect them to open their mouths. When it is the turn of one of my own household girls she pleads politely 'Please wait a little,' then proceeds to indulge in a hearty laugh. When she finally manages to compose herself she sings fairly correctly. Inwardly I have moaned and gotten terribly impatient and then counseled myself to have patience, for they really don't know any better. Now, after the training they have had, they can sing a few songs.

"Another step forward came when I was sure of such continued attention that I could begin to tell them Bible stories. This is always done with the help of a picture, which, as such, and entirely irrespective of its subject, has to be fully explained. In the beginning they repeated the Bible stories very poorly in spite of many questions, and in some cases I noticed that the girls from rather bigoted Buddhist families were purposely inattentive. I do not force them to retell the stories, as I fear it would only make them stubborn. My silent prayer is that some of the seeds of truth may fall into fertile ground and bear fruit later on.

"On the whole the girls come fairly regularly, or they have acceptable excuses for staying away. Some of these excuses will be amusing to American girls. I find among them on my list, gathering wood for fuel, working at the mill, plowing, weaving and winding thread on shuttles for the weavers. Then each girl has her day as the village shepherdess and goes with some other girl to keep watch over the flocks. The matter of hairdressing is also an excuse for absence. This is a momentous affair, as it only takes place about once in a month or six weeks. It takes several hours to go through the process of washing and plaiting the hair, weaving in little woolen tails and sewing on fancy ear-flaps and turquoise bands. Autumn brings a set of excuses of its own; reaping, gathering and drying apricots, watching the fields against innumerable birds, and pressing oil from the kernels of the apricots. Occasionally an illness or an invitation prevents them coming and in the winter months they must attend all weddings, which play a great part in the village life.

"In spite of the work seeming to be all of an uphill nature and some of it apparently of little consequence there is the encouragement of seeing a little progress each week, though often it is very small. Our greatest hope is that this little school may develop, and become a blessing to many. Later on most of these girls will marry and go to other villages. If we could make it possible for them to take some Christian light into their surroundings there, we would feel that we have not labored in vain. We pray that the friends of missions in America may give an occasional thought and prayer to this new work here in the Himalayas."

TOPICS OF INTEREST AT HOME AND ABROAD

—AT MARQUETTE, MICH., on March 25, court proceedings began in a suit brought by Colonel Roosevelt against George A. Newett, editor of the Ishpeming, Mich., Iron Ore, in which the colonel claimed $10,000 damages for libel because of a statement made in that paper last fall to the effect that the former President "gets drunk and that all his intimates know about it." Among those whom Colonel Roosevelt intended to put on the stand in his behalf were James R. Garfield, formerly secretary of the interior; Jacob A. Riis, Robert Bacon, former secretary of state; John Callan O'Loughlin, former assistant secretary of state; Truman H. Newberry, formerly secretary of the navy; William Loeb, Jr., Frank Carpenter, two secret service men who attended him when in the White House, Drs. Murphy and Bevan, who attended him after he was shot in Milwaukee, Drs. Rixey and Lambert, Gifford Pinchot, Governor Hadley of Missouri; General Leonard Wood and Mr. Lawrence Abbott, of the Outlook. Colonel Roosevelt's chief object in bringing the action was to destroy the widespread effect of statements and insinuations of similar tenor to the passage in Iron Ore of which complaint is now made. The ruling of Judge Richard C. Flanigan, which barred all newspaper reports and rumors from the evidence, was an important factor in favor of the prosecution. At the close of one of the most animated trials this country has ever seen the jury awarded Colonel Roosevelt a vindicating verdict and six cents damages.

COLONEL ROOSEVELT ON THE WITNESS STAND AT MARQUETTE

—ON MAY 22, State Senator Stephen J. Stilwell, of New York, went on trial for bribery in the criminal branch of the Supreme Court. He was charged with having sought to obtain from George H. Kendall, president of the New York Bank Note Company of New York, a considerable sum of money for his influence in getting a certain bill reported out of committee in the Senate and the Assembly. After a trial lasting two days he was convicted. The verdict rendered him liable to ten years' imprisonment and $5,000 fine, and also stripped him of his office, and overruled the decision of the judiciary committee exonerating him from these charges, and the adoption by the Senate of that decision on May 12 by a vote of 28 to 21.

—THE BANKERS INTERESTED in the financial affairs of Mexico have announced the issue of bonds for a two-year loan of $27,000,000 by the National Railways of Mexico and for a Mexican Government loan of about $10,000,000.

Mr. Bryan's Peace Plan

IN THE carrying out of every great reform, the pioneer has to run the gauntlet of sharp criticism, abuse and misrepresentation. When Mr. Bryan became secretary of state, he did not hesitate to declare himself an advocate of international peace and a believer in the principle that there is practically no dispute between nations that cannot be settled better by reason than by war. He even ventured the prediction that the world had seen the last great war, but the Balkan campaign, which cost many thousands of lives and changed the map of Eastern Europe, speedily proved him a false prophet. Now he has further demonstrated his ardent love of peace by framing a concrete plan, the particular object of which is to prevent precipitate wars by a chain of treaties which would impose on the signatories the duty of submitting to arbitration of a novel type any dispute that may arise among them, the purpose being to permit the dangerous period of "hot blood" to pass without any overt act, and to allow the question at issue to fall into channels which may be reasonably depended upon to guide it to a satisfactory conclusion without hostilities.

Mr. Bryan's "peace plan," which has already been communicated to several foreign governments and conditionally approved by ten, is briefly as follows: the new treaties, which are not intended to supersede others now existing, provide for submitting the quarrel to a commission of citizens of both nations involved, for investigation on its merits; a guarantee is to be exacted that no declaration will be issued and no strategic movement be attempted, pending the inquiry; a time limit is to be set for the commission's work; and the Powers may reserve the right to independent action after the report has been received. This plan, it is urged, would enable the contestants to discriminate between vital and non-vital questions and would give time for undue excitement to subside. Followed out logically, it would eliminate the danger of sudden war, begun in haste and "hot blood," in obedience to public clamor, which is so often grievously wrong. It would not stop war—probably no human being could devise an infallible recipe for securing peace. The one hidden rock of danger would be the question of national honor, as, when no other excuse sufficed, a headstrong nation, bent on belligerency and probably with a view to material advantage, might easily waive all other considerations save the paramount claim of national insult. But even that point might be so searchingly sifted by the commission as to leave no ground for such a pretext. On the whole, Secretary Bryan's plan, if adopted, might prove a long step toward better international feeling, and consequently would make for peace. It is certainly well worth a trial, and would probably be approved by all classes of people except the irrepressible and tempestuous "jingoes."

Feasible Church Union

WHEN all is said and done it must be admitted that the subject of church union is not one which arouses very intense enthusiasm among the rank and file of Christians. In almost all cases those who are aggressive and vigorous in church work have certain profound convictions, partly the result of heredity, partly of experience, which they find it difficult to think of surrendering. They are interested in these distinctive forms and beliefs; they have a warm affection for their home denomination; they like to promote its activities, and believe that by so doing they can best forward the cause of world-wide Christianity. So the principle and project of church union is unfortunately not of supreme interest.

Nevertheless there is a deep conviction that all denominations should work toward this goal, and all Christians rejoice at concrete signs indicating progress in this direction. The spectacular gathering in Atlanta during the last part of May, when approximately 1,600 Presbyterian commissioners met simultaneously in three great assemblies, emphasized a certain phase of church union which must appeal to most Christians as not only extremely desirable, but also practicable—that is, the organic union of denominations which have the same doctrinal and governmental basis and form.

There had been some fear that the enthusiastic advocates of union might take advantage of the goodfellowship sure to be felt on this occasion to stampede the various assemblies for immediate amalgamation, so the stipulation was made that the matter of union between the Northern and Southern bodies was not to be discussed. But much was accomplished, nevertheless; and the Southern church and the United Presbyterians took some positive parliamentary steps. Altogether the earnest sermons, the amazing union communion service, the Pentecostal gatherings, the great union mass meetings, the delights of daily intercourse, socially and in the interests of the kingdom, tended to make organic unity an attractive proposition, and it may not be long before all the Presbyterians of America shall be dwelling together in one denominational home.

The World's Evangelization

IT IS to be regretted that we do not hear with more frequency the theme of world-evangelization discussed in our religious assemblies. In a recent address before Southern Baptists, Mr. J. Campbell White, general secretary of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, sounded a note which deserves more than passing attention. Formerly, it was the general impression that centuries would be required for carrying out the church's great work of giving the whole world the Gospel, but the last two decades of effort in that direction have changed this view. Now, the entire globe is known and practically accessible and the mind and heart of almost every nation are open to the Gospel. Many petitions are coming for missionaries from lands till lately heathen. In India, China, Japan, Korea the truth is given "free course" with a cordial liberality hitherto unknown. In many places there is now a self-sustaining, self-propagating Christian church. Missions have spread beyond all anticipation, and there is in many places a strong movement for the development of a native Christian ministry. Further, the people themselves are furthering the work by liberal gifts, which steadily increase; multiplied Bible translations augment the efforts of the missionaries. Even in remote places, where all these cheering signs are not yet visible, the movement has begun to be Gospel-ward. So encouraging is the whole outlook, that the more sanguine have already begun to hope that the great task may be much nearer accomplished than the Christian world dreams of. All of this is a mighty incentive to greater effort among the home churches. The doors are open, the workers are calling for reinforcement, that they may enter and preach the truth until, by God's grace, the last of earth's races has heard the message of salvation.

A Beautiful Testimony

SELDOM do we find a more convincing illustration of the value of practical Christianity in winning the heathen than this, in a letter from Superintendent G. H. Malone of the Nanking Orphanage, China:

> The very thought of saving human life appeals to the Chinese. It is not an uncommon thing to see a Chinaman bargaining for a caged bird, so that he might secure it and let it fly away—thus acquiring merit in the other world. This is not only done with birds and animals, but oftentimes children are purchased and given better homes and other advantages, with the firm conviction that in the other world blessings will be in store for the benefactor. The work missionaries have been doing through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Orphan Fund has met the approval of thousands of these people. In talking with some of my friends a few days ago, one remarked: "Preaching has its place, mission schools are doing a splendid work in training young men and women for useful lives, but those who take the helpless and destitute and provide a home, give them a trade, make them to see the meaning of life and the dignity of labor, are doing the work of the Carpenter of Nazareth, the only perfect man—Jesus Christ, the Son of God. That work has done more to convince me that Christianity is divine than any other work missionaries are doing." I pass on this testimony to you, readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and to you who are making it possible for some of us to rescue a few of the helpless and homeless children of China. We say, "God bless you."

In these days of wondrous transformation, when the greatest miracle in the history of missions is taking place before our eyes and the Chinese are calling for the Gospel, let no one undervalue the opportunity afforded of winning the children. They, in turn, will become the evangelists of the future. "He that winneth souls is wise," with a wisdom that reaches beyond time to eternity.

The "Morals Court" Experiment

IT IS only fair to admit that in certain respects the Middle West displays more skill and courage in lines of pioneer reform work among the unfortunate and the criminal than are found in other sections of the country. One of the latest evidences of this fact is the establishment of the "Morals Court" in Chicago, which deals with all cases involving violations of the city ordinances regarding the social evil. This court makes it a point to exalt mercy and helpfulness, instead of hurling the terrors of the law at all offenders alike. In other words, it is a reformatory institution, keyed to a work of rescue, and endeavors to give to the offender opportunity and strong encouragement to forsake sin and make a new start in life. The pariah class is its special object of sympathy and assistance. It comes a long way nearer to the ideal set up by the Founder of Christianity than any other court before which such cases are now tried. It has attached to its staff women probation officers and women physicians, and it co-operates with employment agencies in finding work for the unfortunate class of offenders who come before it, and who are willing to make the effort at social rehabilitation. Of course, like every other attempt in altruism, it is sharply criticized as being a foolish and fanatical experiment; but its purpose is clearly noble and its methods are humane, and we are led to hope that it may demonstrate its value as a reliable agent in social reclamation work. If it should do this even in small degree, it will be a blessing to society. No one can sit through a police court session, with its heartless and frequently brutal treatment of such cases, without wishing that some system more in accord with our Christian civilization could be substituted. We ought to be able to give even the poorest of moral weaklings a chance at least for redemption.

General Notes

THE MOVEMENT in support of retaining the Bible in the public schools of the United States made a splendid advance when, on May 20, Governor Tener, of Pennsylvania, signed a bill under the terms of which ten verses of the Bible must be read daily in the public schools of that State. The Scripture passage is to be read without comment. Teachers who refuse to comply with the law are subject to dismissal.

—THE MISSION TO LEPERS in India and the East is now responsible for the maintenance of fifty-two asylums for lepers in China, Ceylon, India, Burma, Japan, Siam and Korea, and of twenty homes for untainted children of leprous parents. Thirty other stations are aided by grants of funds for Christian teaching or for support of lepers. Twenty-seven of these asylums for lepers are managed by missionaries under United States Mission Boards. The secretary of the Mission is W. M. Danner, 105 Raymond Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Monument to "Maine" Heroes

ON DECORATION DAY there was dedicated a beautiful monument in memory of the officers and men of the battleship Maine who went to their deaths when the warship was blown up in Havana Harbor the night of February 15, 1898. The memorial stands at the Columbus Circle entrance to the Central Park, New York City. Among the distinguished personages present were the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of War, the Governor of New York and the Governor of Maine, the Commander-in-chief and the division and ship commanders of the Atlantic fleet, the Mayor of New York, and scores of leading citizens. Before the unveiling services there was one of the greatest parades ever seen on Memorial Day. Soldiers and sailors from Cuba had an important place in the column, and received especial marks of public favor. After prayer had been offered by Bishop Greer, the monument was given to the city in an able address by General James Grant Wilson, chairman of the Monument Committee. He said the monument cost $175,000, raised by subscriptions throughout the country, mostly in small amounts from a million of the plain people. As "The Star-Spangled Banner" was started by the fleet band little George Hearst, dressed as a sailor, gave the silken ropes a jerk, and the large flag fell away, disclosing the beautiful memorial. Wreaths from President Wilson, the States of New York and Maine, the city of New York, and the republic of Cuba, were placed as decorations. The last wreath was by the gallant Admiral Sigsbee, who, with tears in his eyes, placed the floral offering for the Atlantic fleet. Mayor Gaynor then accepted the monument in becoming words. An appropriate letter from President Wilson was read. Ex-President Taft made the principal oration. "The monument we dedicate to-day," said Mr. Taft, "is an enduring witness of three facts. The first is the gratitude that our country feels toward the men who went down on the Maine, in that they gave up their lives in her service. The second is the birth of a new people and the founding of a new nation through our disinterested aid and sacrifice. The third is the expansion of this nation into a wider sphere of world usefulness and greater responsibility among the nations than ever before in its history." Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels then spoke. Said he: "In the wide range of patriotic story as it comes to us in the tales of the sea there is no finer illustration of heroism than that exhibited at the time of the blowing up of the Maine. How beautiful is the life wedded to duty! How glorious is the spirit of the sailor who gives up all to stand watch for his race, and gives up his life for his country!" Admiral Sigsbee, who was greeted with prolonged cheering, gave a thrilling account of the tragedy, and praised the sacrifices of the brave men. Señor Calderon, of Cuba; Governors Sulzer of New York and Haines of Maine, made timely addresses. The brave men do not need the memorial stone. They gave to their country their all, and have had their reward. The living need the monument to teach the young and old as well how to do, and dare, and die for others. On this monument and the tombstones of all who have sacrificed their lives for their country can be written this epitaph:

He being dead yet speaketh. (Heb. 11: 4.)

Plants Pearls in Garden

FOR a few weeks Mr. and Mrs. Charles Frederick von Glahn of Berlin, Germany, stopped at a leading hotel in New York City. Their son, five years old, was greatly interested in the planting of flower seeds in the boxes of the garden on the roof of the hotel. When the workmen went to their luncheon it occurred to the lad that he would do some planting himself. So he slipped into the room, and going to his mother's jewel case, took out about eight thousand dollars' worth of pearls, which looked to him so much like seeds, and planted one in each of the forty flower boxes into which the gardeners had sown the flower seeds. The nurse caught him putting down the last pearl, and the men had to undo all their work in hunting for the precious jewels, all of which were found. The boy did not know the great fact of God's universe, that life can come only from life, and that a dead thing like a jewel cannot start a stem or bear a flower. But when we look closer at the child's performance, we see that he planted wiser than he knew, that live things can come from pearls; that gold and silver and precious stones can produce life of ever-widening influence; that from them in good soil grow universities, libraries, hospitals, institutions of beneficence that bless the infirm, the diseased, the unfortunate in body, mind and heart. Pearls of wealth can be so planted that they grow churches and evangelical and missionary institutions. They can make a garden of God, the desert blossom as the rose. The world would be better off if quite a proportion of the fabulously costly jewelry of our time could be planted to these ends. Christ told the rich young man it would be necessary for him to sow wealth in poverty if he would have a harvest of spiritual treasure.

Yet lackest thou one thing: sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, follow me. (Luke 18: 22.)

Doctor Dies a Martyr

DR. HUGH BAKER, of Connellsville, Pa., died from blood poisoning, contracted while treating a charity patient. Dr. Baker had a large practice amongst the wealthy residents of his city, but it was his custom to give the poorest people of the community his best service free of charge. It was while operating upon a charity patient that he became infected, and, though they took him to the Mercy Hospital in Pittsburg, and did all they could for him, they could not save him. Dr. Baker is only one of the many thousand physicians who become martyrs to their science and to their benevolence. The general public does not know how much genuine charity work our physicians do, and it often seems as if those who have the best practice and the most imperious demands on their time are most generous-hearted in their treatment of those who are not able to pay them. Dr. Baker and other martyr physicians like him copy the spirit and service of the Great Physician, of whom it was said:

Women Aid Boy Singer

ENRICO ALESSANDRO, the son of poor parents in Greenwich, Conn., has an unusual voice. When a comparatively small boy he sang on the street corners to get money to help in the support of his family. He also sang to secure his own education, including a course in law, which he finished with his degree a year ago. Soon after his graduation in the law school he met Caruso, the great singer, who said, "What, study law with a voice like that?" Several women of wealth, taking a deep interest in the career of the young man, collected over $1,000, with the promise of more, to send him to Rome, Italy, for study in vocal music, with the hope that he may become a star in the musical world, and contribute in some real way to the happiness and development of society. The women are rich, and will not miss the money they spend on the vocal culture of the young man now just twenty years of age, and they have a wealth superior to their silver and gold in the disposition they have to do this benevolent thing for a worthy, talented youth. Young men of fine musical ability were selected, and were subjected to the most competent vocal training to fit them to sing in the worship of the Lord's house. There is this mention of them:

So the number of them, with their brethren that were instructed in the songs of the Lord, even all that were cunning, was two hundred fourscore and eight. (1 Chron. 25: 7.)

Hurled Stones, Scattered Roses

THE severe and mild side of human nature, the diabolical and angelic element in earthly conduct, appeared in striking contrast in the recent street-car strike in Cincinnati. As a car containing strike-breakers came to the corner of Fourth and Vine Streets workmen on a new thirty-four-story building threw out of the windows bags of cement, pieces of marble and rough timbers down on the top of the car, breaking holes in it, driving the conductor, motorman, and strike-breakers to cover, frightening the pedestrians, and calling mounted policemen to the scene of danger. The policemen on entering and ascending to the top stories of the building were not resisted by the workmen, who went quietly back to their work. But there was a tie-up for some time at this point of assault on the car track. After a few days of conference a mutual agreement was reached, and the strikers resumed work. Peter Rossak, the chief sculptor of the new building, was so shocked at the shower of stones the men had thrown out of the windows on the car the Saturday before that he proposed that the settlement of the strike should be celebrated with another aerial bombardment. The men looked at him in wonder when he said bombardment with roses. But these sturdy men, thinking the idea a beautiful one, hastily made up a purse among themselves, and bought all the roses and other flowers out of the flower stores in that region and rained them down on the cars and men who manned them. The Christ that stilled the tempest is the only one who can quiet the storm of human passion, and quell the tumult of earthly strife. Laws are important; boards of arbitration have their office, but it is the temper of the individual soul after all that determines the strife or peace of the community. Christ came to turn the individual heart and society from the bitterness of hate to the sweetness of love, the hurling of the stones of wrath into scattering roses of affection. The spirit manifested in the settlement of the street-car strike was that of the Master, who brought peace out of the storm in the natural world.

He arose, and rebuked the winds and the sea; and there was a great calm. (Matt. 8: 26.)

Kiss Papa for Me

KISS papa for me," was the message sent by a little girl to her father, confined in the death cell at Montgomery, Ala. The words came over the telephone to Deputy Sheriff J. F. Tucker, who went upstairs to the prisoner under the death watch and told him he had a kiss for him from his daughter. The man cried like a child, and begged the officer to take a kiss to the child for him. And the officer did so, but before he did the rope was put about the condemned man's neck and he was hurried into eternity. Could any scene be much more pathetic than this? Boys are splendid, with their romp and rollick, and dash, and impulses and virtues, and buddings of manliness, but no one has had the complete paradise of parental joy who has not had a girl baby in the house. No matter what the prisoner had done, he was the little girl's father, and she sent him a kiss that had in it a love stronger than her life. We have here in this story a suggestion of the love of the divine Father that goes down past the sins into the heart of the sinner, expressed in these words:

But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. (Rom. 5: 8.)

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW*

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON BY DR. AND MRS. WILBUR F. CRAFTS

PERSONS: Names of persons about whom we have studied during the quarter: Isaac, Rebekah, Esau, Jacob, Laban, Leah, Rachel, Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Issachar, Zebulon, Dinah, Joseph, Benjamin, Midianites, Potiphar, Pharaoh, the two sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh.

PLACES: Haran, Canaan, Beersheba, Bethel, Padanaram, Edom, Peniel, Shechem, Egypt, Goshen (trace these places out on a map).

DATES: B.C. 1796 to B.C. 1689.

EVENTS: Isaac, his eyes being dimmed with age, and all of his faculties depleted, was deceived by his son Jacob. Jacob became an exile from home as a result of his perfidy. Leaving Beersheba he went to dwell in Haran, which was outside the land of promise. In his flight he stopped to rest, and received a vision from God, which made him a new man. He became a part of his uncle's household at Laban, where he dwelt fourteen years and became the father of a family of twelve sons and one daughter, and the owner of extensive flocks and herds. After these many years Jacob determined to return to his paternal estates in Canaan. On the way the angel of God met him, and gave him a preparation of heart to meet his brother Esau. The heart of Esau also was softened by the power of God, so that the two brothers, estranged so long, met in loving embrace. After his return to Canaan Jacob became a blessing because of the many wells which he dug in that parched land. All of his sons save two were shepherds. There were ten grown men and two boys, one of whom was Joseph, and the other Benjamin. Joseph was the son of destiny, and this aroused the ill-feelings of his grown-up brothers. They plotted against his life, but in the end sold him as a slave, and as such he reached Egypt. Faith in God and faithfulness in duty were the characteristics of Joseph in his life as a slave. The good report of him reached Pharaoh, the monarch of Egypt, who summoned him to the palace, that he might give expert testimony concerning warnings which had been sent to him from God as visions, or dreams. The help of God was with Joseph, and he was able to foretell that after seven years of great fruitfulness in Egypt there should be seven years of dire famine. Pharaoh at once appointed Joseph his chief commissary, and bestowed upon him the royal chain and ring as emblems of his authority. Joseph ordered a number of vast store-houses to be built, and these he filled with grain during the years of plenty. And when the years of famine came, the people were able to get from him all of the foodstuff which they needed. The fame of the plenty of Egypt reached Canaan, where there was also famine. The father and brothers of Joseph were among those who lacked food, but Joseph knew it not, until one day his ten shepherd brothers arrived in Egypt to buy corn. They knew not Joseph, but he knew them. Joseph, desiring to know what was in the hearts of his brothers, determined to test them, both as to love of money and unbrotherliness. They stood the tests well and showed themselves to have become true men. Then Joseph made himself known to them, and willingly forgave them, and made generous provision for their needs, both in food and clothing. Then he sent them back to bring his aged father and his youngest brother down to Egypt. Then followed a glorious family reunion, an honorable reception of the aged father Jacob by the monarch of Egypt, and an allotment of the best land wherein to dwell. For the space of seventeen years Jacob lived as a pensioner on the bounty of Egypt and died there. A state funeral was given him by order of Pharaoh, when all of the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, and all of the house of Joseph, the chief ruler, with chariots and horsemen, as well as all the sons of Jacob and their households, making a very great company, went from Egypt to Canaan to bury the embalmed body of Jacob in the cave of Machpelah at Hebron with his own people, Abraham his grandfather, and Isaac his father.

God's providences. When we consider such a life-history as we have been following, we must know without a doubt that man is in God's thought. This is the way Christ put it: "Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? One of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. Fear not therefore: ye are of more value than many sparrows." Matt. 10: 31 and Luke 12: 6, 7.

The life of Joseph is interwoven with the providences of God. No one knew this better than Joseph himself, for did he not say to his brothers when they trembled in his presence after he had made himself known to them: "Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. . . . And God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance." (Gen. 45: 5, 7.) In saying this did not mean to exonerate his brothers from their malicious and cruel treatment of him, but rather to show that God in his providence had made evil a vehicle for good. But let no one be confused by this and excuse himself for doing wrong that good may come as telling a lie to save life. Such reasoning would make God the author of evil rather than the redeemer from sin.

Another thing clearly set forth in these lessons is the efficacy of prayer. Jacob, in his loneliness in the desert, in the night, as he was fleeing from the wrath of his brother, had a dream prayer for God's help, and a glorious vision was granted him, which made a new man out of him (Gen. 28: 10-22). And when he was returning to his home, fourteen or more years afterward, he spent the whole night in prayer (Gen. 32: 24-31), and as a result the fear he had to encounter his brother Esau was turned into a harmonious incident. Not much is said about the prayers of Joseph, but his reply to Pharaoh showed that he was a praying man: "God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." (Gen. 41: 16.)

The duty of faithfulness was exemplified by Jacob in that he expected to work for his living, God helping him, and he promised to give tithes to God, a tenth of his profit.

Joseph was faithful in every relation of life: As a son, his father could depend upon him to carry out instructions, as when he went far away at his father's command to see if it was well with his brethren, and well with their flocks. As a slave he was faithful, for when Potiphar, the captain of the guard, bought him from the Midianites, to whom his brothers had sold him, and placed him in his household, his faithful service caused Potiphar to promote him to the place of chief overseer of his household. When he was summoned before the king of Egypt as an interpreter, he was faithful to his God, assuring the king that power to tell him what he wanted to know rested in God and not in himself. Joseph was faithful in the high position to which the king appointed him as commissary, so that when the years of famine came there was an abundance of grain in Egypt, which Joseph had been storing in barns for seven years. Joseph was faithful to his brothers, when they came to Egypt in a starving condition, though unknown to them he so disciplined them that manhood at its best was developed in them, while loving care for the young and the aged began to flow from their hitherto selfish hearts. Joseph's faithfulness to his father continued to the end, for unto the day of Jacob's death, Joseph sustained him with the best that Egypt could provide, and followed him to his burial with the highest honors Egypt could give.

Jacob and Joseph belong to the ancients, and we are the moderns. But the truth of God knows not age; it always has been and always will be the same in its application to human lives. China is the modern illustration of the vitality of the truth of God. China, the oldest nation in the world, the longest steeped in idolatry, after a hundred years of missionary work is casting away her idols, and beating them to dust in the streets, throwing herself at the feet of the true God and asking "her Christian sister republic," the United States, to pray for her. Again "the people that walked in darkness have seen a great light" (Isa. 9: 2). Great is the joy of those who in God's name went forth to preach the Gospel there!

*THE INTERNATIONAL SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON for Sunday, June 29, 1913. Acts 7: 9-16. Heb. 11: 20-22. GOLDEN TEXT: "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." 1 John 5: 4.

OUR SUNDAY SCHOOL SUPERINTENDENTS' ROUND TABLE

—CHILDREN OUGHT ABSOLUTELY TO BE brought into the church by twelve, if possible, before the dangerous "teen age," that they may be fortified for the temptations of that period. Twelve is the age at which Jesus joined a church which God had closely supervised. Boys and girls are older in mind to-day at twelve. In those days they were not "twenty-one" till they were thirty and at thirty is to twenty-one, twelve is to eight, which our courts count as the age of responsibility. Whether children should join the church at eight or not, they certainly are capable of being Christians as early as they are capable of being criminals, and if not received in full membership they should be led to make clear-cut Christian life as early as eight, and be enrolled in a "Junior Church," or in some other way.

—HERE IS A GOOD thing from Mr. G. G. Mahy on the supreme work of the Sunday school as an evangelistic agency: "The evangelistic minister develops his Sunday school into an efficient evangelistic agency. The teachers are trained to deal personally with their scholars, and to bring them to the place of decision. The decision service is not a haphazard and hurtful thing, but it is a service wisely planned. The claims of Christ upon the children are presented in a form which they can understand, and with a wise and tactful tenderness which draws their hearts to him. The decisions thus registered are strengthened by the pastor's instruction class until the children of the church enter the membership of the church as true lambs of the flock fed by a faithful shepherd."

—JUDGE WILLIS BROWN argues, and we think rightly, that to give a boy's energies right direction is the best way to keep him out of mischief and vice and crime, and tells of a boy arrested for housebreaking who showed in court that he could pick open any lock, but was saved by challenging him to make a lock that nobody could "pick," which he did. That gave him steady and stimulating employment with a locksmith and he became an honest and useful citizen. A companion story is that of a delinquent Chicago boy, who passed from one corrective institution to another until he arrived at the John Worthy School. Here, in spite of every effort, he grew increasingly incorrigible, until there seemed nothing left but to send him to the industrial school at St. Charles. This boy, however, had a special friend at court. Though the other instructors had found him an impossible pupil, his art teacher thought she had discovered in him a spark—only a tiny one at that—of interest in drawing. She begged the superintendent to turn him over to her. After weeks of tireless labor she succeeded in fanning that spark into a flame. John became so absorbed in his art that he hadn't time to be naughty; and he developed a talent, amounting almost to genius, which has taken him at last to the Art Institute, where he has outstripped all his classmates, with brilliant prospects of becoming a light in his profession. Where Industry and Interest go hand in hand a boy's natural activity has little chance to lead him astray.

scrubbin' ye so oft as all that? Why, I niver knowed anybody as iver took a scrub barrin' a Saturday night. Ivery day? Why, it looks like a sinful waste o' water. It do indeed, ma'am."

"Oh, it isn't altogether on account of dirt, although I do get a good bit of grime on me going about the streets as much as I do; but a bath, especially of a morning like this, gives you such a clean, fresh feeling, Rosie, for all day. It just makes you feel clean away down deep inside of you. It's a good deal easier, I'm thinking, for folks to be good when they keep themselves clean."

"Mebbe you're right, ma'am, sure 'tis the time most folks set out fur church. I'd allus thought they went because it were a Sunday. Belike 'tis the scrub they got the night afore. Sure, an' I like to go to church and hear the mewsic an' say me prayers—whin I'm clean anough an' got some decent things to put on me back. I ain't been this long time.

"That's a terrible sight o' water," she added, a reflective eye once more on the glistening tub, "an you've sure set out wan large dish to ketch the drip in."

"Suppose"—the suggestion seemed a mere afterthought—"I leave you here to undress and jump into that tub. Let's see how clean you will come out. Soap is a big help, and that brush there would almost take off the skin, let alone the dirt—this is the way it works. See, isn't that hand of yours clean—isn't it beautifully clean, though? Here are towels, and this is the way you let the water out of the tub—if you should happen to need a rinse."

Alone in the next room the deaconess listened delightedly to the splashing. This rich, strange life surging about her here in Halstead Street was continually flinging up its derelicts, but in all her experience she could not recall anything quite like this. The mothering instinct in her, quick always to respond to the call of helplessness, especially the helplessness of a child, was stirred, of course, but for the moment the deaconess, the altruist, with all her high designs on the captured energies of these poor submerged, was entirely sunken in the woman filled merely with a devouring curiosity to know what this small and vividly alive creature would say and do next.

In the course of a half hour the door of the bath opened, and the child emerged, damp but shining. "La," she said, with radiant satisfaction, "look at me now! Why, there ain't a speck on me, 'less"—she reflected—"'tis on me insides. But ain't these clothes o' mine bum?"

"Never mind your clothes," said the now thoroughly aroused deaconess; "what I'm caring about is that hair. It's so thick and curly that I'd just love to comb out the tangles. I have a pink ribbon somewhere that would be lovely on it."

As she set to work she talked, she asked the child about her mother—her home—striving to piece out of the meager fragments some whole of life that would afford her the clue to the one best way—she did not question there being a way—of resolving the situation into something higher and happier for the man as well as the child. Rosie remembered her mother. "She were a lady," she said with proud satisfaction, "an' we had silver forks to our house with a letter on the handle and enough of 'em to go round. And," she went on, slowly and dreamily, as if charmed by her own recital, "we had lace curtains to the parlie windies an' a stove wid a chimbley that would draw fur ye to bake yer biscuits on.

"It were a large place where we lived, ma'am; it reached—well! I tell you, ma'am, there wan't nothin' between it and the sun. And the sun we had out there, it were large. too—oh! a good bit larger than the sun they got here. It were most as big round as a tub an' not so smoky. And it were never hot in summer—not very. They called it the country, ma'am. Belike you've niver seed the country. Oh, have you? So thin you know what it is like, too. An' have ye iver picked the flowers a-growin' in the woods? Oh, my! ain't that fun?

"Some like dog fights and scrappin', but I don't keer fur them things—much. I'd a heap ruther enjoy myself some other ways, but thin, of course, there ain't room fur lots of things—such-like as drivin' the cows up from the pasture an' follerin' after the plow—here in the city. Sure, but I do like the country. The kids in our neighborhood goes out there sometimes fur a week. A woman takes 'em an' ye don't pay nothin', but la! I niver could leave me fambly fur a week. There's no tellin' what he'd git into."

The story languished for a minute, and then, with a quick indrawing of breath, as a fitting climax to all the grandeur she had been recounting, she resumed, "I went to a party onct, an' I wore a white dress. I were young then—seven, ma'am—an' my pa he had to come after me when the party was done. He had a Sunday hat them days an' he looked—well! he looked some like your fambly, ma'am. Anyhow," she added with a quick instinct of apology—"he looked more like' em than he do now."

"Well!" said the deaconess, passing lightly the parallel of "famblies," "those must have been happy times."

"Yes," said the child, for the very first time a note of wistfulness creeping into her tone, "I wisht it could be like that some more—I wisht it could." And then she twisted her head suddenly and looking desolately into the face of the deaconess asked, "What makes mothers die?"

The deaconess put her hand to her throat; she felt a curious kind of aching there that made speech slow and difficult. "I don't know, Rosie," she said in a very low tone—"I wish I did."

She plied her comb in silence after that. It was a long, slow process, but in the end the tangles yielded. With great inward satisfaction she gave a final twist to the pink bow that rose rampant above the smoothed and really lovely locks. "Go look in that mirror and see what you think of yourself," she said, smiling softly.

The child surveyed the clear, bright image. "Miss Rosie O'Brien," she said to it, the true Irish lilt in her fresh little voice, "and whin did you git back from Michigan Avenoo? I love pink"—she turned to the deaconess—"'tis such a healthy color," and then she added forlornly again, "Ain't these clothes bum?" The deaconess eyed them closely, and as the child was quick to note, disapprovingly.

"I should think," said the deaconess thoughtfully, "that if your father worked steadily he could buy you better."

"Sure and he could, ma'am," confirmed the child, "he's a terrible worker whin onct he's set a-goin', and the bricklayin' is grand pay; but 'tis this way, ma'am—he's on and thin he's off agin, wid the rint goin' on steady, spreein' days and all. I'm minded to take his wages off him intirely, but the other women they sez to me, 'Rosie O'Brien, you'd ort to remimber yer mercies. Quiet-like as that man is in his cups he's ort to be jinglin' his own coin in his pocket and takin' his bit o' pleasurin' same's airy other man.' But they're so dirrty whin they're underfoot like him, now, ma'am, and I hate dirrt, I do, indeed, ma'am. But 'tis little ye can do wid the whole of a man like him whin ye can't iver git but a piece o' yer own self in the bit of a small tin washbasin. I do be thinkin' that the drinkin' makes 'em far dirrtier.

Baking 300,000 Meals Daily

Here's the result of baking beans such as no one else has baked.

Our chefs, on the average, daily prepare 300,000 meals of Van Camp's.

Every month in this magazine we tell you about them. And sometime a dish of Van Camp's is bound to appear on your table.

Then we are done.

Van Camp's themselves will win you and hold you if you only give them a chance.

Van Camp's BAKED WITH TOMATO SAUCE PORK AND BEANS

"The National Dish"

Here are beans, Mrs. Housewife, which come to your table with all the fresh oven flavor.

Some of the ablest chefs have spent years and years in bringing the dish to perfection.

The beans we use are picked out by hand. The tomatoes are all vine-ripened.

The baking is done by superheated steam, which doesn't touch the beans.

Thus the beans come to you nutlike, mealy and whole—none crisped, none broken. And the luscious sauce which is baked with the beans, permeates every atom.

If you served twenty kinds of baked beans, the folks at your table could, with one taste, pick Van Camp's. We have tried this.

If Van Camp's stand out that way—because of their excellence—don't you think it pays to get them?

A million women do.

THE BURDENS OF A "FAMBLY"

"I knowed a man onct"—she paused that the deaconess might get the full weight of this astounding thing—"what never drinked no time at all. He were a switch watchman, and he'd ha' been fired quicker'n wink if ever he'd swallered a glass. He were that clean, ma'am! And they had a pianny to their house and his girl Mame took mewsic lessons and she wan't no bigger'n me."

"Music lessons?" echoed the deaconess; "music lessons! why, would you like to take music lessons, Rosie?"

"Well! would I?" The child folded her hands in a quick and eloquent gesture. "'Tis the main reason I'm worrkin' to make hivin, ma'am, that I may git me hands on wan o' thim harrps. Sure, and I won't know how to play on me harrp, but I do be thinkin' wan o' thim tinder-hearrted angels will show me a bit.

"Course, I'd a heap ruther win a pianny, and I wouldn't care a cint how good I'd have to be to git one, but they don't seem to deal much up there in any kind o' mewsical instrymint savin' the harrp, ma'am. 'Tis so in this worrld that ye have to take pretty much what ye can git and belike 'tis the same in the worrld to come."

The deaconess put her hand to her throat again and again she felt that curious kind of choke that was a far, far remove from laughter.

"I was just thinking," she said, softly, after quite a long silence, "that up in our club-room there's a piano that you would be perfectly welcome to come and practice on a little every day if you cared to do so. And I would just love to give you lessons, Rosie."

A fit of trembling seemed suddenly to seize the child as the greatness of this wonder grew. She could find no word adequate as she sat there staring out of her great brown eyes seeming for the first time to be what she actually was in years—a child.

"But," said the deaconess quite positively, "I'd want you to come clean, and I'd want him to clean up, too."

She pointed to the limp individual out on the settee. "We have some shower baths down in the basement, and I know a great many men and boys who make use of them. Could you coax him to come and get scrubbed?"

"Oh, I don't go much on coaxin'," said the child, her piquant nose in the air. "I tell him to do a thing, and he goes an' does it. Sure and why shouldn't he, ma'am, whin I cook fur him and scrub fur him and do fur him and be both father and mother to him? If you want him clean, clean he's got to be."

"And when he's clean"—the deaconess seeing her glorious opportunity put on the screws without mercy—"then make him stop drinking, Rosie, make him stop entirely. Don't let him take a glass—not even an occasional glass of beer. The women are all wrong when they tell you to let him take his pleasuring in this way. There are a thousand other better, sweeter, safer pleasures that any father—"

Telepathy may have some explanation for it, but at any rate the limp individual on the settee began to show symptoms of coming to. He sat up. He reached down and felt of one leg, felt of the other. They were on—the two of them on! "Must ha' got tired and walked back," he remarked in grateful recognition of their attachment to him.

Perceiving the woman in the scrap of a bonnet standing up in the doorway, he rose with a dignity befitting the occasion on his devoted but sympathetically unstable legs and introduced himself by the chief distinctive title left him—"I be Rosie's pa"—then catching sight of the small, judicial figure back of the deaconess he added, precipitately, in beautiful Hibernian, "I be goin' back to worrk to-morry."

"You be goin' back to-day," was the instant, stern correction. "And whin the Saturday night comes"—here the prisoner at the bar stood up with his mouth wide open that he might receive his full sentence therein—"and whin the Saturday night comes, ye do be fetchin' me yer pay to the very last cint of it. I give ye back—what do thim shower baths cost, ma'am? Not anything at all—not anything at all!

"Sure," she turned once more to the shrinking head of the "fambly." "Sure, and I do be givin' ye back not anything at all. Ye'll take yer bit o' pleasurin' same as iver ivery Saturday night and"—she paused impressively—"ye'll take it in a shower bath."

Winding the voluminous shawl about her small shape, she walked her unresistant charge off to "worrk" without further ceremony, and before the very eyes of the delighted deaconess who, the purely abounding woman in her once more awaking, stole softly downstairs after them that she might the further feast her eyes on the sight. In her inmost consciousness dwelt no doubt as to the thoroughness or the permanence of this work of grace—this instantaneous and beautiful work of grace wrought in a "fambly."

As the pair were about to round the corner the deaconess sent her voice far down the street—'Don't forget your music lesson, Rosie; come tomorrow at four."

And the child instantly turned her head. The "fambly" still required her guiding hand—the unrelenting firmness of its pressure—in the steering of a straight course down a perilous street. She had not loosened her hold, but there must have come some momentary slipping of the burden, for she smiled winsomely and as a child.

keeping slaves. All women are practically slaves. They are bought and sold as such. We had one bright little girl in the school who we learned had been paid for with a boy slave. Her master calls her his wife, and, fearing that she would learn that she could have her freedom for the asking, he has refused to let her come to the school any more. She is only about twelve years old.

As was stated, the men usually carry a gun, which is the largest extent of their labors. The women dig the fields, harvest the grain or cassava, pound it out, grind it and make it into food. It is not strange that as every woman must thus support herself, her children and husband, the most of them prefer their husbands to have a plurality of wives. Perhaps nowhere have we seen the curse of slavery more plainly demonstrated than in the capital of the Aluunda kingdom, where Mwata Yamvo and his two hundred odd wives live. These wives live in idleness so long as they are favorites, having slaves to wait upon them. When they cease to be favorites, they are degraded according to their sense of the word. According to our judgment, they could not become more degraded than they were when in high favor.

The dawn of a better day has come for the Congo-Belge. Especially in Katanga, the Belgian officials are doing their best to bring order out of chaos and make law-abiding citizens of these lawless savages and cannibals. But it is a work no government can do alone. Only the freedom which is in Christ Jesus can make these people really free.

Anti-Sweat

insures a cool body—an odor-free body—and foot-ease all the time. Nothing quite like Anti-Sudor. New and harmless. It's a liquid—not a wasteful powder or smeary paste which clogs the pores. Not only prevents excessive perspiration, but leaves a delightful, sweet fragrance which lasts. Makes a refreshing bath. Best lotion for tired, swollen, achy feet.
